TRANSACTIONS OF THE SURVEYORS' INSTITUTION

SESSION 1928-1929.

DIAMOND JUBILEE CELEBRATION,

Thursday, 14th June, 1928.

Mr. C. B. FISHER, C.B.E. (in the Chair).

The CHAIRMAN said these days were days of celebrations of anniversaries, and last week he had the pleasure of representing The Institution in connection with the celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the Institution of Civil Engineers. The Surveyors' Institution had not progressed as far as that in age, but it had got to its sixtieth anniversary, which was one of the decades always celebrated in connection with anything connected with societies and personal gatherings. He hoped the members appreciated what had been done in commemoration of the anniversary in connection with the meeting room, because he thought they could heartily congratulate the Building Committee of The Institution in having secured the services of Mr. Sydney Tatchell, and could congratulate him most heartily on the way he had carried out the work. Every member was glad to see, especially the country members, that the panelling had been done in English oak. The work had been carried out by Messrs. Holland & Hannen and Cubitts in their usual good style, and they must have had hard work to be able to finish in time for the Celebration. Everyone much appreciated the work they had put into it and the hard work of their employees in completing it successfully for the present occasion.

The Institution had had only two Secretaries during the sixty years, Mr. Julian Rogers, who was Secretary from 1869 to 1905, and now he was glad to say they had still Mr. Goddard, who had been Secretary from 1905 and was able, therefore, to record the history of The Institution during that period, and from the records of the past to obtain a full history of the sixty years. He would call upon Mr. Goddard to read his Paper, and he was sure it would be handed down in the annals of The Institution as one of the most interesting Papers read before the members.

Mr. A. GODDARD, C.B.E., then read his Paper entitled—

SIXTY YEARS OF THE INSTITUTION.

One can hardly imagine an occasion such as that we have met to celebrate, the Diamond Jubilee of the founding of a great professional society, being allowed to pass without a glance back over the sixty years of its life, and an attempt to place on record some account of its growth, its activities, and its ideals.

At first sight it might not appear difficult to prepare such a record ; indeed, the late Mr. Julian Rogers and Sir John Oakley, in their retrospects of forty and fifty years respectively, have shown how successfully this can be done. I am not sure, however, that the excellence of their Papers does not make my task the more formidable. I am met at once with two difficulties, the first in finding more ground to break, and the second in the endeavour to steer between the Scylla of a mere statistical statement and the Charybdis of generalities. While I shall endeavour to guide my frail barque safely between these menacing dangers, I must claim your indulgence if I seem, to some extent, merely to echo what has already been better described by my predecessors.

Sixty years ago the business of the land, its management, development, and valuation, and the treatment of the various interests therein, had only recently emerged as a distinct profession. The introduction of the railway system, land enclosures, the commutation of tithe, and the great industrial development of urban areas, had called for the services of men thoroughly competent to deal with the complicated problems which arose, and, as so frequently happens, a band of men appears to have arisen to meet the demand. To our eyes looking backward with a certain amount of perspective, these men seem to have attained the stature of giants in their profession. One needs only to mention the names of such men as John Clutton, whose portrait by Grant hangs on these walls as first President of The Institution, Edward Ryde, Sir Henry Hunt, Edmund James Smith, W. J. Beadel, M.P., and John Horatio Lloyd, to conjure up the ghosts of a great past.

Looking back on these men, there is a natural tendency to adopt the attitude of laudator temporis acti, but fortunately their ideals, their judgment and their capacity have found a counterpart in later days. To mention a few only of those who have thrown themselves energetically into the work of The Institution during the past quarter of a century, and who have now passed from us, there have been men such as Albert Buck, Charles Bidwell, Howard Martin, J. H. Sabin, Lord Alverstone, Robert Vigers, H. M. Cobb, and last but not least, Daniel Watney, who was the connecting link between the old and the new, and who, while a contemporary of the founders of The Institution, never failed to understand and sympathise with the aspirations of the younger generations. One would almost have liked to devote a Paper to the personality and characteristics of such men as these, on whom the mantle of their predecessors had fallen, and to whom the reputation of The Institution in the official and professional world is so largely due. Suffice, however, here to say that we have been happy always in finding men of high standing in their profession ready to give of their time and talents in administering the affairs and guiding the policy of The Institution.

Turning again to ancient history, even before 1868 there had been attempts to form coteries of men engaged in the profession of the land for the purpose of meeting to discuss questions of difficulty or interest arising in the course of their business. The first of these resulted, in 1792, in the formation of the Surveyors' Club, with its motto of "Grex Amicorum" ("A Flock of Friends"). This club, at first consisting of sixteen (subsequently increased to twenty) members, was confined mainly to the architects and surveyors of the great City companies in London. Happily, after 136 years, it still flourishes, living up to its motto, and comprising leading architects and building surveyors among its members.

The Surveyors' Club was followed forty years afterwards by the Land Surveyors' Club, about which one of its members, who was, happily, hale and hearty and taking an active part in its meetings within the last five years, used to say that the year 1834 was famous for three special reasons—it was the date of the foundation of the Land Surveyors' Club, it was one of the finest port vintages recorded, and it was the year of his own birth. The membership of this club was not confined to surveyors practising in a particular branch of the profession, though, actually, most of its original members—and, indeed, of its subsequent members—have been largely concerned in the management of country estates in addition to general practice. In catholicity, therefore, it may be looked upon as the direct forebear of The Institution.

It was not perhaps surprising that the members of these clubs, and of the Surveyors' Association, a very similar body founded in 1864, realised the need for something more wide-reaching, for a distinctly professional society, membership of which would be open to all properly qualified men throughout the country. A precedent for such a movement had been given by the engineers and architects, who had established professional societies representing their professions in 1818 and 1834 respectively.

The time was opportune for the formation of such a body to represent the profession of the land. I have already referred to the increasing demands made upon surveyors by reason of the wonderful developments of the mid-Victorian era; the renaissance in agriculture, the "Golden Age" of agriculture, as it has been rightly termed, coincided with this period, the population was increasing rapidly, the Committee-rooms of both Houses of Parliament were full to overflowing with Private Bills for town improvements, railway, dock and harbour extensions, and the enlargement of borough areas, matters which brought surveyors from all parts of the country to London, either in support or in opposition. Professional friendships were formed between men from all parts of the country, who in less favourable circumstances might never have met, and a feeling of understanding and confraternity grew up which provided a solid foundation upon which to base the new society.

A general meeting of surveyors was held in March, 1868, at which it was decided that it was expedient that an association be formed, to be called "The Institution of Surveyors"; and a number of gentlemen were nominated to form themselves provisionally into such an association, and to take the preliminary measures for organising The Institution. A committee was then elected to draft bye-laws and regulations, which were reported to a general meeting in June, 1868, and adopted. The Institution had definitely come into being, and the occasion was duly celebrated in the truly British manner by an inaugural dinner. This was held at the Cannon Street Hotel just sixty years ago, and was attended by a hundred persons. It is interesting to note among those attending many names which are happily still prominent in the profession; those of Clutton, Horne, Vigers, St. Quentin, Oakley, Tuckett, Trollope, Ryde, Steward, Lofts, Watney, Driver, Buckland, Horsey, Ellis, and Fox, at once catch the eye.

One cannot pass from this sketch of our earliest days without setting out the names of the original Council, and here, too, will be found names which, through sons or grandsons, still find an honoured place in the personnel of the present Council or Standing Committees, or in the list of members.

OFFICERS OF THE FIRST COUNCIL.

President	... John Clutton.
Vice-Presidents	Henry Arthur Hunt, Jeremiah Mathews, Richard Hall, Edward Norton Clifton.
Members	... Messrs. William James Beadel, Frederick James Clark, Henry Cawter, John Bailey Denton, Robert Collier Driver, Thomas Huskinson, John Oakley, Edward Ryde, Edmund James Smith, William Sturge, George Trist, Francis Vigers.
Associates	... John Horatio Lloyd, Frederick Joseph Bramwell.
Hon. Secretary	John Wornham Penfold.

Sir John Oakley, in his Address of 1918, informed you that the ideals at which the founders of The Institution aimed were (a) Intellectual advancement by promoting a higher standard of educational training; (b) Social elevation, by raising the status of the profession in the eyes of the public; and (c) Moral improvement, by fostering the best spirit of professional conduct; and he took these objects as the text upon which to base his retrospect of our history. I feel, therefore, debarred from following that course, and shall endeavour to deal quite generally with what I conceive to be the prime reasons for The Institution's growth in numbers, activity, and reputation. If it should appear that we have ground for satisfaction at the position attained by The Institution since 1868, we shall, I think, be able to congratulate ourselves that the ideals of our founders have been kept in view.

While I wish to avoid so far as possible a mere tabulation of figures, one cannot escape them altogether in dealing with the growth of The Institution from very modest beginnings—at the end of 1868 it numbered 202 members—to its present membership of nearly 7,000. There must always come a time in the early life of a new undertaking when the question will arise, Will it go forward and make good or will it lose ground; there can be no standing still. While The Institution gradually increased in membership, and, indeed, when only ten years of age obtained statutory recognition in the Metropolis Management and Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1878, being appointed as one of the two professional bodies empowered to report to the Secretary of State upon any new bye-laws framed by the Metropolitan Board of Works, its progress was leisurely, the business to be transacted by the Council was small, and its future gave some cause for anxiety to those responsible for its welfare. In May, 1869, the late Mr. Julian Rogers had been appointed Secretary to collaborate with the Honorary Secretary, Mr. J. W. Penfold, and the Council could perhaps have selected no more suitable man. Not only had he a wide knowledge of the profession, but the activity of his mind, his powers of organisation, and his initiative, must have proved of the greatest service to The Institution during those early and difficult years.

I believe it would not be inaccurate to say that it was largely due to Mr. Rogers' influence and foresight that the Council of that time decided upon two moves which had an immediate and lasting effect on The Institution: the first of these was the petition for a Royal Charter of Incorporation, and the second the setting up of a system of examination to qualify for membership. The effect was speedily apparent, membership jumping up from 535 in 1882 to 722 in 1883 and 1,121 in 1885.

The petition for a Royal Charter proved successful, the first Charter of Incorporation being granted by Her late Majesty Queen Victoria in August, 1881. This was followed recently by the grant of a Supplementary Charter (October, 1921) by His Majesty King George V. These, however, are not the only instances of recognition accorded to The Institution by the Royal Family. His Majesty King George V. in 1921 honoured members by accepting the office of Patron of our Society; in 1925 His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who is respected and loved by every class throughout the country, found time in the midst of the multifarious demands upon him to attend our Annual Dinner; and to-day our banquet at the Guildhall in celebration of the Diamond Jubilee of The Institution will be graced by the presence of His Royal Highness the Duke of York, who is ably following the traditions of his family in his devotion to public duty.

While no doubts existed as to the wisdom of petitioning for the grant of a Charter, considerable difference of opinion showed itself at first with regard to the advisability of setting up an examination system. We must remember that fifty years ago the idea of qualification by examination was comparatively new. It had only recently been adopted for the Army, and although it was a necessary condition for those wishing to practise in the statutorily regulated professions of law and medicine, it had not been adopted as a necessary qualification by the older professional societies upon whose constitution and organisation those of The Institution had originally been drafted. There was the natural feeling of the practical man in favour of a practical qualification, coupled, doubtless, with a fear lest the examination system might lead to the divorce of practice from theory. Fortunately, however, as we see now, the more far-sighted view prevailed, and in 1881 the first examinations were held, 13 candidates presenting themselves for the Preliminary and two for the Professional. The lead given by The Institution in this respect was shortly afterwards followed by other societies, and all now, which have any pretensions to professional standing, require candidates for membership to undergo the test of the examination-room. In the case of The Institution, the Council, in order to meet the criticism that such tests must to a great extent apply to theory only, scrutinise the antecedents of each candidate, and satisfy themselves that he has sufficient opportunities by a period of training in a recognised office to grasp the practical side of his profession before being permitted to sit.

While the examinations were first held in 1881, the door to membership without examination was not definitely closed until 1891, by which time the number of members had increased to upwards of 2,000. It seems probable that the grant of the Charter in 1881 was largely due to the broad-minded policy which had been initiated by the Council to insure that after a certain date all future members of The Institution would have attained a definite standard of professional knowledge, of which proof could only be given in the examination hall.

Since the very modest start with two candidates in 1881, nearly 20,000 candidates have submitted themselves for the professional examinations, and of these about 12,500 have passed. It would be difficult to overestimate the effect on the profession as a whole of the concentration and study represented by these numbers. Even those who have been unsuccessful must have benefited to some extent by their studies, while the general raising of the standard of knowledge and attainment among qualified men will have had the effect of necessitating a higher standard also even among unqualified practitioners. To this extent the decision of the Council fifty years ago may be claimed to have proved of direct advantage to the public.

Time will not allow any detailed account of the further efforts which have been made by The Institution for the advancement of professional education. A short reference however, may be permitted to the Special Diploma Examinations, the scholarships which are granted at Universities, and the grants which have been made to places of education.

Since 1900, examinations for special diplomas have been held triennially, or more frequently if a sufficient number of candidates offered themselves for examination. These examinations afford a very severe test of the candidate's knowledge of the practice and theory of the particular subject taken, and possession of a diploma indicates that the holder may be looked upon as an expert thereon. The subjects in which special diplomas may be obtained are Land Surveying and Levelling, Forestry, Sanitary Science, Rating, and Agricultural Valuations. During the past quarter of a century a considerable number of members have successfully passed these examinations and have obtained diplomas. One would like to suggest, however, that still more candidates should realise the advantages not only arising from the possession of a diploma, but from the study and application which its possession represents. A sufficient number of candidates should enter to justify the holding of yearly examinations in most of the subjects.

The policy of offering scholarships at Universities was adopted at the beginning of the present century, a modest start being made by the grant of one scholarship annually, value £50, in the agricultural school at Cambridge University. Later the number was increased to four, two of the value of £80 and two of £50, to be held at any recognised University in a course approved by the Council as bearing on the profession of a surveyor. The object of the Council in founding these scholarships was still further to raise the standard of professional attainment by passing into the profession each year a number of men with the highest educational qualifications obtainable. The cost of living at all Universities having so largely increased since the war, it has been decided in future to increase the value of these scholarships to £130 per annum at Oxford and Cambridge and £100 at other Universities, while reducing the number so that the charge falling upon the Institution will remain the same. While in the past the competition for these scholarships has been good, it is hoped that the change will tend to attract still more candidates of the type and of the ability likely to make good in the profession.

The policy of The Institution in furthering professional education has also been evinced by substantial financial grants to Oxford and Cambridge Universities for their agricultural, forestry, and rural economy schools, to the Royal Agricultural College, and to the Rothamsted Experimental Station. But perhaps the most important movement it has made in this direction has been in the support, financial and otherwise, given to the College of Estate Management. The idea of providing for the education of the ordinary young surveyor, who could not contemplate a University course, by the foundation of a teaching as distinct from a coaching organisation, sprang from the fertile brain of a respected member of The Institution, Sir William Wells, when President of the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute. His proposals were heartily supported by the Council of that society, and, on the new College being founded, the Council of The Institution were invited to co-operate in making it a success. This they have done, both financially, as already stated, and also by nominating representatives on the governing body. The College was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1922, when His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales honoured it by performing the inauguration ceremony.

It may be thought that for an examining body, such as The Institution, to give active support to a teaching body, such as the College of Estate Management, was to venture into somewhat slippery places, but the Council have been careful to guard against the dangers which such a connection might involve. While they nominate certain of the governors of the College, these latter, as soon as they are appointed, act independently of The Institution; they make no report to The Institution on the work of the College, and the Council have no corporate knowledge of or influence over the methods of training adopted. There is, therefore, no direct connection between The Institution examinations and the courses of study which may be taken by students of the College, and the examiners do not know whether a particular candidate has studied at the College or obtained his tuition elsewhere.

If I were asked what, apart from the devotion of so many of its members, had contributed most to raise The Institution to the position it now occupies, I should be inclined to answer the adoption of the examination system and the setting up of the County Branch organisation. The latter, under the somewhat infelicitous term of "Provincial Committees," were first established in a rather tentative manner in 1888, and, like the examination system, only after considerable discussion as to the wisdom of the course, some apprehension being felt lest the tail should attempt to wag the dog. During the first years these local organisations were confined to Kent, Devon, and Cornwall, Norfolk and Suffolk, Somerset and Dorset, Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmorland and Durham, and Leicestershire, Northamptonshire and Rutland. I well remember the first meetings of the last named, as I had just entered the office of Mr. (afterwards Sir) John Rolleston, who was elected Chairman of the newly formed Branch, and at his suggestion I was made the, extremely nervous, secretary. But they were very pleasant, those meetings. We used to start about 11.30 a.m., and, after completing our work—discussion on Bills before Parliament, general business, or whatever it may have been—adjourn to a substantial lunch, which, I am afraid, made any real concentration in the afternoon almost an impossibility. Times were less strenuous then.

The doubts felt by some as to the wisdom of setting up this new organisation seem to peep out in the wording of the Annual Report for 1888. It there states: "The new arrangements have been received with great satisfaction by members in the various districts, and will be extended to other parts of England should experience justify the step. It only remains to add that the utmost care has been taken to give these arrangements a character purely ancillary to the existing Constitution and Bye-laws of The Institution." Fortunately it was found that experience did justify the step, with the result that we now have a complete organisation of County Branches covering the whole of Great Britain and Ireland. By this organisation members in distant parts, who can seldom attend our meetings in London, have their own local gatherings and sessional programmes, which are attended from time to time by the President, Vice-Presidents and other members of the Council, or by myself. They also have a considerable amount of administrative work placed upon them in reporting upon candidates for examination and election, while their views are frequently sought by the Council when the latter are engaged in the preparation of reports on legislation or other questions affecting land, in connection with which the opinions of practical surveyors may prove illuminating. By these means the Council are enabled to speak authoritatively as representing the profession in all parts of the kingdom; while the member at a distance is made to feel that he is a part of a well-organised and living entity and can, should he wish to do so, make his voice heard in the counsels of his professional society.

Since the grant of the Supplementary Charter in 1921, a further important duty has been placed upon the County Branches in nominating candidates for the election of Council. I trust that the responsibility attaching to this power will always be fully realised; and that in the future, as in the past, the utmost care will be taken to select men who are recognised to be leaders in their profession. It is clearly essential that if the Council of such a body as The Institution is to continue to occupy the position it has always held in the public estimation, it should be composed of the very best that the profession can provide.

A year later, in 1889, the organisation of the Junior Members was established, with the object of providing for the interest of those who by reason of their age or inexperience did not feel qualified to take an active part in the Papers and discussions at the Ordinary General Meetings of The Institution; and also to provide a training ground for men who in later years might serve upon the Standing Committees or Council. This scheme has served its purpose well. Apart from the Central Organisation covering the whole country, six County Branches have been formed, where the number of Junior Members within such distance of each other as to make meetings practicable is sufficient. A glance at past lists of officers of the Junior Organisation is pleasant reading, and indicates how frequently this early training has proved a stepping-stone to more responsible posts in the administration of The Institution's affairs. Youth, too, is frequently somewhat inarticulate, hesitating to make known its ideas and aspirations. By means of the Junior Organisation this difficulty has been met, and the Council have been able to ascertain and understand the wishes of the large body of members comprised in the Junior ranks. I think that I can fairly say that the good feeling which should exist between the governing body of a professional society and all ranks of its members has been greatly augmented by this means.

Any retrospect of the sixty years which has passed since The Institution was first launched on its career would be incomplete without some reference to the address in Westminster with which it has been identified from the very beginning. In the autumn of 1868 the first floor of No. 12, Great George Street, comprising a large front room for meetings, and two smaller rooms at the back, was rented as the offices of The Institution; a most fortunate choice, as it happened, for not only is this site particularly convenient from its contiguity to the Committee-rooms of the Houses of Parliament and to the Government Departments and London County Council, but it seems unlikely that this side of the street will be acquired, as has the north, for Government offices. Mr. Julian Rogers, in his recollections given before The Institution in 1910, is very amusing in his description of the placid and contemplative atmosphere of his office at this early period; but with increasing activities more space was required, and in 1871 the interest of the superior lease was purchased. Notice to the other tenants was given, and the whole house re-planned to fit it for its new purpose. The work was completed in 1873, and the accommodation thus provided sufficed for the needs of The Institution for another twenty years, when membership had grown from 304 to 2,350. By arrangement with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners the un-expired leases of Nos. 12 and 13A, Great George Street (the lease of the latter having been acquired about 1888), were surrendered and a new lease taken for a term of 999 years, together with leases for the same period of No. 13, Great George Street, and Nos. 3 and 4, Little George Street. A site of nearly 7,000 square feet, worthy of a fine building, was thus provided, and a number of leading architects were invited to enter a limited competition for the work. The design of the late Mr. Alfred Waterhouse, R.A., proved successful, and the front part of the building as we now know it was his work, completed and opened in 1899.

This, however, is not the last word with regard to your headquarters. The demolition of old buildings at the rear of The Institution in Little George Street, and other changes necessitated by the erection of the Middlesex Guildhall, enabled the Council to extend our offices southward in 1912, slightly lengthening the Lecture Hall and providing contiguous offices for the Secretary and Staff. The work was carried out by Mr. Paul Waterhouse, son of the original architect.

Since then no changes calling for comment have been made until the present year, when, to commemorate the Diamond Jubilee, which we are now celebrating, it was decided to supersede the barn-like appearance of the old Lecture Hall by something more worthy of The Institution and of the remainder of the building. This work, designed and carried out by Mr. Sydney Tatchell, F.R.I.B.A., has just been completed, and must, I think, be acknowledged to fulfil its object.

So, always in the same place, your house has grown from time to time until it is as you see it to-day. Will your family continue to grow, so that in another decade or two further additions must be made? The answer to that question must rest on the lap of the gods, but should extension prove necessary in the future, it has been provided for by the foresight of a generation ago, the superior lease of No. 10, Great George Street having been purchased in 1905. The short lease on that property runs out in about ten years' time, and the Council of the day should then be in a fair position to judge whether No. 10 or any part of it is needed for Institution purposes. If that proves to be the case, it should not be difficult in rebuilding No. 10 to incorporate such additional accommodation as may be required into the present Institution building.

Time will not permit more than a reference to the Library, which has been accumulated during the past sixty years; the Forestry Museum, and the collections of geological specimens and building stones, which are open for the study of students and, indeed, also of practising members requiring information on these matters.

The late Mr. Julian Rogers in his charming Paper of 1912 on "An Evening in The Institution Library" displayed a wonderful knowledge of the typographical and other works to be found on its shelves, an acquaintance doubtless begun during the placid and contemplative period already referred to, but impossible to maintain under present conditions. Even Mr. Wheatley, our genial Librarian, could not, I fear, claim an intimate acquaintance with many of the works which find a place on our shelves. Apart, however, from a very complete set of reference and text-books bearing on every aspect of the profession—agriculture, forestry, law, building, taxation, &c.—which is continually being kept up to date, The Institution possesses one of the finest collections of topographical works in the country and many other treasures representative of the printer's art in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Perhaps the most beautiful of these is a wonderfully preserved copy of Bracton de legibus et consuetudinibus Angliæ, published in 1569, the spacing and type of which it would be hard to improve upon.

For further information as to the treasures they possess, and many quaint extracts from the volumes on the Library shelves, together with inimitable notes on their authors and former owners, I would refer members to Mr. Rogers' Paper already mentioned. It will appeal to the many, as well as to the bibliophile, as Mr. Rogers possessed the knack of turning a sentence or telling a story which invested it with peculiar charm.

One cannot leave this part of our history without mentioning The Institution publications. In the sixty volumes of Transactions, presenting the Papers read at Ordinary General Meetings since 1868, in the twenty-six volumes of Professional Notes, and the seven volumes of the Journal, has been accumulated a mass of information by delving into which light may be obtained on almost any question connected with the profession. Fortunately these volumes are well indexed, enabling this to be done. The change made in 1921 by which the Professional Notes, formerly issued four or five times a year, were replaced by a monthly Journal has been generally welcomed as tending to bring matters of immediate interest to the notice of members more regularly and at an earlier date than could formerly be done.

In the course of the year many valuable Papers are read and discussed at meetings of the County Branches in different parts of the country, and at Junior Meetings. It is unfortunate that these cannot be made more widely available for the use of members, but space in the Journal is limited, and it is, therefore, only occasionally possible to publish these Papers in its pages. Their writers, no doubt, recognise our difficulty in this respect, and realise that in a publication such as the Journal a number of short articles dealing with the different matters is likely to prove of greater value and of wider interest than one or two long Papers. At the same time I frequently feel a good deal of regret at having no permanent record of so much good material.

Largely through the instrumentality of the late Mr. Daniel Watney the Benevolent Fund was established in 1899. This association, which was incorporated in 1901, is entirely separate from The Institution, although its funds are only available for the assistance of members or their dependents who have fallen on evil days, and the Committee which administer its resources is provided over by the President of The Institution for the time being and is wholly composed of members. The reason for this division is that under our Charters and Bye-laws none of The Institution capital or income can be used for the individual advantage of its members, and the Benevolent Fund has therefore been drawn wholly from voluntary sources. There have been many generous donors, and it would perhaps be an invidious task to select one for mention rather than another. I cannot, however, refrain from referring to Mr. Thomas Dinwiddy, whose recent death we so greatly deplore. During his lifetime, apart from smaller donations, he presented the fund with £1,000 on three separate occasions, founding the three Dinwiddy annuities of £50 each, the second of which was in memory of his son Conrad Dinwiddy, R.F.A., who was killed during the late war. We have since heard that Mr. Dinwiddy has bequeathed in his will a further sum of £1,000, free of duty, to enable a fourth annuity of £50 to be founded.

As is the case with other organisations connected with The Institution, the Benevolent Fund has been one of gradual and steady growth, though since, and perhaps as a result of the war, a gratifying increase in the interest taken in the Fund has been shown. The number of subscribers and the total of the annual subscriptions have considerably increased during the past ten years, a result largely due to the co-operation and energy of stewards appointed by the County Branches. The annual subscriptions last year reached the satisfactory total of £1,247, from which grants to applicants of approximately £1,000 were made. The value of the invested capital at the same date was £16,173, from the interest on which fifteen annuities amounting to £750 were given. Mr. Watney used to look forward to the time when the Committee would have £1,000 a year from subscriptions to administer. This goal has now been passed for some years, but the demands on the Fund tend to increase proportionately; apart from small printing charges and postages there is practically no cost of administration; cases are most carefully investigated, but at the same time sympathetically and confidentially, and members may feel assured that any donations they may entrust to the Committee will be well and faithfully administered.

As must have been the case with every large professional society, the war had an immediate effect upon its activities, its ordinary work was largely and necessarily curtailed, but new duties over a wide sphere of action were undertaken by both The Institution and individual members.

Our records show that some 3,000 members joined the Colours, and of these the names of 307 appear on the Roll of Honour in the Entrance Hall, generously presented to The Institution by Sir John Oakley during his year of office as President. This beautiful example of the illuminator's and the writer's art, prepared by the late Mr. Allan Vigers and Mr. Grailey Hewitt, was loaned to the War Memorial Exhibition at Burlington House in 1919, where it was one of the most admired of this type of memorial.

It has proved almost impossible to trace the various military honours which were gained. We know, however, of 20 D.S.O.s, one with bar, 106 Military Crosses, 2 with bars, 5 Distinguished Flying Crosses, 4 C.M.G.s, 1 C.B., and a large number of foreign decorations and mentions in despatches. In a special case in the Library may be seen our Service Roll, giving the names, unit and rank of those who served in the Naval, Military, and Air Forces. This was written by Miss Margaret Holden, of the Royal College of Art, South Kensington, and both in its execution and binding will, I think, be found worthy of its object.

No record can be attempted of the civil services in connection with the war which were given gratuitously both by The Institution and by its members either too old or too frail to join the Colours. As, however, the surveyor's is perhaps the most ubiquitous of the professions, so the duties undertaken by our members were the most diverse. Many served on County Agricultural Committees and were prominent either in the production of food or in the organisation for its production; others were engaged in the purchase, felling and conversion of timber for every kind of use at home or in the war areas; the recruiting or mobilisation of labour for agriculture and munition works, war risks insurance, the acquisition of land and buildings for war purposes, the erection of the innumerable huts required for the troops, prisoners of war, and munition workers, the organisation of relief for those suffering from war conditions, the valuation of air-raid damage, the provision of facilities for professional study for British prisoners of war, are only some of the matters upon which members were engaged during those strenuous years.

At The Institution itself Committees were engaged on proposals for the provision of employment for those likely to lose their livelihood through the war; in reporting on cases of those connected with the profession who claimed exemption from military service; in dealing with the breaking up of grassland and the provision of manure for the growth of corn and potatoes; in the acquisition of land for planting; in the settlement of claims against County War Agricultural Committees; in providing places of retreat during air raids; and, after hostilities had ceased, in assisting in the demobilisation schemes. Ten years have now passed since those days of anxiety and endeavour, and any attempt now to tabulate the directions in which The Institution tried to take its part in the national effort must be incomplete. I might, however, add that The Institution building was placed without charge at the disposal of the Government for meetings and committees of every kind.

On the 31st March, 1918, a Memorial Service to members who had fallen was held in our Parish Church, St. Margaret's, Westminster. There was a very large attendance of relatives and friends of those in whose honour the service was held. In the absence through illness of Canon Carnegie, a most suitable and effective address was given by the late Rev. H. F. Westlake, and the service was closed by the sounding of the "Last Post" by the buglers of the Scots Guards and the singing of "The Supreme Sacrifice" by Mr. J. S. Arkwright to the beautiful music of the Rev. C. Harris, D.D.

Thus far I have dealt principally with the internal history of The Institution, its foundation, growth, and relationship to its members. It only remains to say something about its relationship to the public.

I have already mentioned the three principal ideals at which the founders aimed, Intellectual advancement, Social elevation, and Moral improvement. While the attainment of these would doubtless benefit members as a whole, it is noticeable that the duty of looking after the personal interests of its members, although an important matter, was not included among the primary objects for which The Institution was established. Sir John Oakley in his Address on "The Fifty Years' History and Work of The Institution" expressed the belief that this readiness to give first place to ideals likely to benefit the public as well as the profession has proved one of the greatest factors in the success which has attended The Institution.

I have always said that the surveyor was the handy-man of the professions; it touches on the ordinary life of the public at innumerable points, more perhaps than even the professions of law and medicine; in the production of food and timber, the management of a large proportion of the agricultural and woodland estates in Great Britain and Ireland being entrusted to members of The Institution; in housing and trade and commerce, the upkeep, letting and sale of the principal urban estates being in similar hands; in the amenities of life and health, surveyors being engaged in the development of estates and town planning; and in the level of rents, quantity and building surveyors by their work exercising an influence on the cost of building. The services of surveyors are also required in connection with questions of rating and taxation; in the settlement of light and air and party-wall disputes; where land is to be acquired for public or other purposes; where advances are to be made by way of mortgage; and in a hundred and one other directions where the life, health or pocket of the public is concerned.

The importance of proper qualification for these duties has long been recognised by Government Departments, public bodies, and the great railway companies, banks, and insurance offices, who frequently look to The Institution for technical advice on matters coming within its scope. Indeed it may safely be said that during the last sixty years practically no public enquiry affecting agriculture, land tenure, property of any kind, rating or taxation, has been held by Royal Commission, Departmental Committees, or other form of investigation, upon which The Institution has not been represented either by members of or witnesses before the enquiring body. This is a compliment to the impartial attitude which the Council has always endeavoured to take up in advising on technical questions, and it is doubtless in recognition of this judicial attitude that The Institution has so frequently been cited in Acts of Parliament and called upon to exercise statutory duties. I have already said that the earliest of these was in 1878 under the Metropolis Management and Building Act (Amendment) Act. This has been followed by the London Building Act, 1894, the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, the Acquisition of Land Acts, 1916 and 1919, the Agriculture Act, 1920, the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, to mention only the more important. In a number of private Acts of Parliament, promoted by public authorities or statutory companies, judicial duties have also been imposed on The Institution, and it may be added that the President for the year is continually being called upon to nominate surveyors to settle differences between individuals arising out of every variety of question affecting land or buildings.

It may, therefore, be claimed that The Institution, and all that it stands for in the way of experience and professional qualifications, is widely recognised by those in authority and capable of forming an authoritative opinion on such matters. I wish the same could be said of the ordinary public; they are confused by the various societies, with or without qualifications, which have tended of late to spring into being, and are unable to discriminate between the designatory letters implying membership of one or other of the professional bodies. Indeed, it is to be feared that in many cases they fail to realise how greatly their interests may be advanced or prejudiced by the selection of their agent. It was to guard against this, and for the protection of the public against their own ignorance in this respect, that The Institution in conjunction with the Auctioneers' Institute and the Land Agents' Society promoted the Registration Bill which was introduced into Parliament in 1923. That measure gave rise to a good deal of opposition, particularly on the part of the legal profession, and it has consequently been allowed to lie in abeyance until public opinion has been more fully educated as to the need for definite and recognised qualifications among those who practice as surveyors. At present any individual can put up a brass plate and hold himself out as eligible and fit to carry out these important and frequently difficult duties; but as in the past it was found necessary to protect the public against itself in the employment of the unqualified or improperly qualified legal or medical practitioners, so in the future similar protection will, I feel sure, be recognised as necessary in the case of other professions.

The members of The Institution, however, possess one great advantage over those of other bodies. Its Royal Charters were granted largely on the ground that membership could not be attained except after a recognised period of training and success in severe examination tests. These requirements have been loyally and honestly enforced, and the designation "Chartered Surveyor," which can only be employed by members, should, if generally used, assist the public to differentiate between the qualified and unqualified individual, and teach them to realise how closely their own interests are bound up in the selection of the person to whom they entrust their affairs.

In the comparatively short time available it would be impracticable to do more than sketch in the very lightest shades the history of a body such as The Institution, and I must, therefore, beg your indulgence for the many omissions and lacunæ which will occur to my hearers. During our sixty years of life many Acts of Parliament affecting the profession have passed through the legislative mill. Other proposals are still in the air, but progress is inevitable, views change, and programmes which to one generation appear impracticable and visionary are accepted by the next as a matter of course. If, however, The Institution continues in its policy of treating those questions in an impartial and judicious spirit, endeavouring mainly to direct proposals upon lines which its collective and technical experience show to be workable, I have no doubt that when the time comes for celebrating its centenary, the position it now holds in public estimation, and in which we feel a legitimate pride, will be still further advanced and consolidated.

The CHAIRMAN said he would call upon Sir John Oakley, the President of ten years ago at the time of the Golden Jubilee Celebration, to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Goddard, and he was glad to think that Sir John did not look a day older than he did at the time of that celebration.

Sir JOHN OAKLEY, G.B.E., in proposing a vote of thanks to Mr. Goddard for his Paper, said that when members came to The Institution and had a Paper read to them in the ordinary way it was invariably followed by a long discussion, but to-day they had not met for that purpose at all, and he was not going to make a speech. However, he was sure those present would not wish to disperse without giving a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Goddard for the Paper he had just read. The members knew well that the Secretary was a glutton for work, but he had created a record that day. In the midst of the additional work which had fallen on him in connection with the Diamond Jubilee Meeting, he had found time to prepare the Paper. Mr. Goddard had a wonderfully retentive memory, but the Paper must have involved a great deal of research into old documents and old records. He was sure he need not say more than to ask the members to give Mr. Goddard a hearty vote of thanks for preparing a Paper which would go down historically in the records of The Surveyors' Institution.

Mr. JOHN BIDWELL (Vice-President) said he had great pleasure in seconding the vote of thanks to Mr. Goddard for his excellent Paper. As Sir John Oakley had stated, there was not very much to be said unless one opened a discussion on the subject, and time was too short for that. He would, therefore, formally second the resolution, feeling sure that it needed no recommendation to any member present.

The CHAIRMAN, in putting the vote of thanks, said he should like to say on behalf of the members how pleased they were to see Mrs. and Miss Goddard present that day, and also to learn that Mr. Goddard's mother had been present and hale and hearty on the previous day at the celebrations at the Garden Party.

The motion was carried with acclamation.

Mr. GODDARD, in returning thanks, said he was very grateful for the vote of thanks they had so kindly passed. He had great pleasure in announcing that there was present that day on the platform an Honorary Member of The Institution, M. Roupcinsky, a very distinguished surveyor from the Continent, who was President of the Union des Géomètres de Bruxelles, Président d'Honneur de la Fédération Internationale des Géomètres, and Vice-Président de l'Association des Géomètres de Belgique.

The CHAIRMAN said he wished to introduce M. Roupcin-sky, and he was sure he need hardly say that everyone was very pleased to see Madame Roupcinsky also present. He wanted to tell them how much the members felt the honour conferred upon them by so distinguished a member of the profession coming to grace the celebrations. Colonel Cole would act as interpreter on behalf of M. Roupcinsky.

Colonel COLE, C.B.E. (Member of Council), said M. Roupcinsky had told him he was not going to speak in English but in French, and on that the members had to congratulate themselves very much because in his own language he was an orator. M. Roupcinsky had given him the heads of his speech, and as translations were boring, not to say difficult, he simply asked that a very short resumé should be given under the heads of which he would speak. M. Roupcinsky would start by apologising, which was entirely unnecessary, and then he would pay many tributes to the English profession of surveyors and hand them many bouquets. He would refer to the service of England in the war, and express thanks on behalf of Belgium to this country. He would then refer especially to the Dixmude-Ypres line and the naval forces on the Ostend-Zeebrugge line, and also mention the name of Philippe Baucq, a Belgian surveyor, who was also a member of the Association, who fell at the same time as Nurse Cavell. On the professional side he would salute—to use the quasi French word—the English profession on behalf of the International Federation, and would very kindly refer to Papers which some members had read at the Congress in 1926, at which over twenty nations were present in Paris. Finally he would kindly present to The Institution on behalf of the Brussels Institution a small Plaque d'Honneur.

M. ROUPCINSKY then delivered a short speech, and presented the plaque to the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN said he could hardly thank M. Roupcinsky enough, on behalf of The Institution, for the very handsome memento of the 60th anniversary from their friends overseas. The members appreciated very much M. Roupcinsky's presence that day, and would long think of him and those members of the profession who had been concerned with the British profession in international discussions. He hoped to see M. Roupcinsky again at The Institution, and trusted that in future the British members might pay a visit to Belgium. The members very much appreciated the presentation, and he thanked everyone on behalf of The Institution for their kindness in presenting it.

The proceedings then terminated.

PRESENTATION OF GAVEL BY MR. LIONEL MARSHALL.

The PRESIDENT said he had much pleasure in presenting to the members, and accepting on their behalf, the handsome gavel he held in his hand, which had been presented to The Institution by Mr. Lionel Marshall, who had been for over forty years a member of The Institution. He was sure it would be unanimously agreed that it was a very handsome implement to put into the hands of the President on the occasion of the holding of the meetings. The members were much indebted to Mr. Lionel Marshall for his kind gift, and he was sure it would be their desire to accord a hearty vote of thanks to him for presenting such a very handsome gavel to The Institution.

The resolution of thanks was carried with acclamation.

PAPER 515.

THE OPENING ADDRESS.

By C. B. Fisher, C.B.E. (President).

After forty-five years' membership of The Institution I can appreciate to the full the benefits attaching to its membership, and I gratefully acknowledge the kindness of my fellow-members in conferring upon me the highest honour they have to offer, the Presidency. I venture to think that this is also the highest honour which can be attained in the profession, and as the third generation of a family which has carried on the practice of a land agent and surveyor for nearly a hundred years, I have sentimental grounds for especially appreciating my election as an honour reflecting upon my firm.

I do not propose in my Presidential Address to deal with the past history of The Institution, which was so ably dealt with by our Secretary, Mr. Goddard, in the Paper he read on "The Sixty Years of The Institution" in June last at the first meeting in connection with our Diamond Jubilee Celebration of this year, but I should like to record, as taking that history a step further, that the programme of the Celebrations, including the arrangements for the Dinner at the Guildhall when the Duke of York was present, the Garden Party at Hampton Court, and the various excursions and entertainments, was most successfully carried through, and to express our thanks to the Committee, and to the Secretary, Assistant Secretary, and the whole of the staff, for the way they carried out their work and contributed to that success.

Although in June last we were able to hold our Jubilee Celebration in this Hall, the work of adornment was incomplete. This evening you see it in its finished form, with the portraits of Past-Presidents in position and their names on the panel behind me. I think we can congratulate late both ourselves and the architect, Mr. Sydney Tatchett, on a worthy memorial of our Diamond Jubilee.

Sixty years have passed; evolution, as in all things, has had its effects. We have our Charters of 1881 and 1921, which attach certain responsibilities and obligations to membership of The Institution, and require a high standard of honour and attainment from the surveyor who becomes a member of our body.

We are all concerned in some measure with some form of real property. Everyone of us who has adopted the profession is connected in some way with its management and development, and consequently has a share, greater or less as the case may be, in the well-being of the public. It is on the aspect of real estate as affecting the health and comfort of our race that I should like particularly to dwell. It is an axiom of economics that all true wealth comes from the soil, about which, though it can grow and produce much that is worthless, John Galsworthy says: "If you "burn gorse, grass almost impudently green takes its place." Soil has natural fertility which can become exhausted, but it also has inherent capabilities, a phrase which originally became familiar to us through the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1900.

The products of the soil are exchanged for the manufactures of urban districts. As long as the requirements of both are satisfied, the actual needs of civilisation are fulfilled, the process is interdependent. With an increasing population the requirements of both expand, and now with a population of over 40,000,000 in Great Britain and over 7,000,000 in London, no one could contemplate a continuance of our existence without the most skilled practical and scientific knowledge which civilisation has developed to meet the requirements of our changing times.

Let us consider, then, what these requirements are:—

In country areas, a primary knowledge of the cultivation of the land; the power of increasing production by artificial treatment; the improvement of our flocks and herds; the use of modern implements and machinery; the construction of premises for the housing of man and beast, designed for economical working; the harnessing of electric power; and experience in the development of areas to suit the needs of cultivation.

In urban districts, where each trade and business has its own needs and requirements, we must again aim at the development of the land, but under these conditions by covering it in the most approved manner with bricks and mortar, dwellings for all classes, shops, business premises and hives of industry, all calling for the skill and knowledge gained by experience and training.

These constitute the aims and objects of our business life, and it would be difficult to overestimate the beneficial effects which, in town or country, may be exercised by the different branches of our profession upon the health of the community and the amenities of their existence. Lord Grey has said that the quality which has most helped the British race in its development has been "the power to combine with the "passion for individuality the sense of the necessity for "order."

There is a danger of our losing our character for individuality. Co-operative bodies, trades unions, and other associations, may, perhaps, tend in that direction. In our Institution character is formed by our individual inspiration and energy; but the combined knowledge and ideals of members work together for the common welfare. Our aim should be service to mankind, and the more efficient that service the greater will be its value, value no doubt in the form of remuneration to ourselves, but also in the form of usefulness to our clients and our country, who benefit by good work well done.

Efficiency of service is based in the first place on the knowledge of the primary principles underlying our business, and in the second on the adaptation of such knowledge to the varying needs and circumstances with which we have to deal. Personal character, personal judgment, and tactful consideration, all help in making for efficiency, and the most successful business man is one who, in the minds of his fellows, best combines these qualities.

If these qualifications for success in the management of real property are necessary, it cannot be disputed that the experience and personal character required of our members, now some 7,000 in number, exercise in no small degree a beneficial influence on the common welfare. Constitutional government has created party politics which affect the trend of domestic legislation. Domestic legislation is dominated by the opinion of the majority of the electorate for the time being, representing the will of the people, but all legislation affecting real estate should be influenced, at any rate, by the advice of those skilled in its management. By following that course the necessary requirements of the public may be met without undue curtailment of the rights of individuals.

Our Institution has no party politics. Collectively we represent all interests concerned, the public, the owner, and the occupier, and we may claim as an Institution to hold the scales fairly between the three when our advice is sought as to the effect of any legislative proposals. The Legislature has during the past half-century frequently recognised the impartial attitude adopted by The Institution in dealing with these questions by citing it in various and successive Acts of Parliament.

There has been a considerable tendency during the last few years for the individual to be merged in the official; for Government departments to undertake duties formerly entrusted to the private practitioner. However greatly those of us who are in general practice may regret this tendency—a natural feeling, perhaps, on our part—I am sure that in expressing my own opinion I am expressing that of members generally when I say that those who have been selected to fill the various official positions which have been established have our entire confidence. It could hardly be otherwise, as everyone of the more important appointments are held by members of The Institution.

This, of course, only affects the property in which the Government departments are interested, and not the rights and values of property as between individual owners or between individual owners and occupiers. But here, again, there is an increasing tendency for the Legislature to pass enactments, such as the recent Landlord and Tenant Act, affecting the relationship between individuals, and this also reacts upon values.

In some cases a basis of value is prescribed by Acts of Parliament; for example, under the Acquisition of Land Acts, 1919, the value laid down is that which a willing seller might with certain other qualifications be expected to realise; while another and different basis of value, which has been subjected to well-grounded criticism, is contained in the Housing Act of 1925. All values, however, either from the point of view of dealings between man and man, or between the private owner and the public, have to be weighed in the balance and determined by the skilled professional man.

Since 1920 upwards of fifty Acts of Parliament have been passed, affecting, to a greater or less degree, the interests with which we have to deal. It is therefore only by the possessor of an intimate knowledge of the legislation which has been placed upon the Statute Book that the true value of real estate can be determined. To some of these Acts I shall refer later.

There are four interests affecting the value of property.

Firstly, that of the owner, acquired by succession or purchase.

Secondly, that of the community, curtailing the value of property by the powers possessed by the community over it and by the burdens imposed for the advantage of the community by means of local and imperial taxation, the effect being direct in the case of taxation and death duties, and indirect, through the occupier, in the case of rates.

Thirdly, that of the occupier, whose interest Parliament has increasingly guarded and enlarged by recent enactments.

And, fourthly, that of the wage-earner, who by the welfare legislation of late years has obtained indirectly a vested interest in the form of a minimum wage (when employed in agriculture) and a compulsory contribution from the employers in cases of ill health and for pensions for old age and unemployment.

Indeed "the old order changeth giving place to new."

Some of the changes are those of natural evolution. The developments of science and technical knowledge in agriculture have enabled the occupier to create for himself an interest and value in his holding in excess of what is due to the inherent capabilities of the soil. Custom has for long recognised that the successful and enterprising occupier has added to his holding values, which would be unexhausted on completion of his tenancy, and from which the succeeding occupiers would benefit. This was recognised first by custom, and later by the Legislature, in the shape of the successive Agricultural Holdings Acts of 1883, 1900, 1908, 1914, and 1923, which have sought to define those rights and to assess their value. A still more recent measure, the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1927, was designed to create in the same way a tenant-right for urban and town properties, providing, as it does, for the making of improvements by lessees, for compensation to be paid for such improvements at the end of the tenancy if they add to the letting value of the property, and for compensation for loss of goodwill or for extension or renewal of the leases of business premises under certain conditions. As in the Agricultural Holdings Acts, the principle followed is that anything left behind by the tenant from which the owner will receive pecuniary benefit should be the subject of compensation. With this principle one cannot cavil; the Act, however, is still in its infancy, and we have yet to see whether the wishes of the promoters have been properly interpreted by the draughtsman. In connection with this measure we can at least congratulate ourselves that it is practically complete in itself, and does not, like so much modern legislation, require reference to other Acts of Parliament in order to ascertain its meaning.

In view of the many changes introduced by modern enactments, may I here put in a plea on behalf of those who are studying the economic and social history of England? The somewhat wild, and certainly misleading, statements that are often made about land tenure in this country, its growth, and history, point to the need of a far more general and exact knowledge of the subject. In these days of transition, when many estates are changing hands or being broken up, the records of the land are often dispersed and destroyed. Members of The Institution might render a great service to historical research in the future by persuading owners to hand over to local historical societies or public libraries documents which would illustrate—

- (1) The inclosure of open fields ;
- (2) The growth and break up of large estates ;
- (3) Fluctuations in the size of farms and rents.

The Master of the Rolls is now making a similar effort to secure the preservation of court rolls of manors and other manorial records, for which purpose he has appointed a public authority, local society, or public library in each county, to undertake the custody of such manorial records as may be deposited under the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1924. Any information about the existence of records or the impending dispersal of a collection which members may be in a position to give might, I suggest, be given to Mr. R. C. Fowler, of the Public Record Office, Chancery Lane, W.C. 2.

To revert to some of the changes which have taken place, owing to progress, to changes of outlook, and to the increase of population, it cannot be denied that legislation was necessary, such as is embodied in the Public Health Acts, 1875 to 1917, dealing with regulations for the supply of water, and for the improvement of sanitation, buildings, and roads. The Public Health Act, 1925, emanating from the Ministry of Health amending these Acts, dealt, inter alia, with building lines, width of streets, and street improvements. The advent of the motor-car and its effect on modern traffic has brought with it its own difficulties and its own department. The Ministry of Transport, also in 1925, passed the Roads Improvement Act to make provision for the improvement of roads by the prescription of building lines, prevention of obstruction of view, &c.

Owners of property might reasonably complain of the excess of legislation affecting their interests, and it does seem in this case there was a want of reciprocity between two Government departments.

It is now just ten years since we met to celebrate the Armistice, which was concluded on the very day that Sir John Oakley, whom we all congratulate on the further honour conferred upon him by His Majesty in recognition of his great and long-continued public services, gave his Presidential Address.

But the cataclysm of 1914-1918, which was then brought to a close, perhaps inevitably, gave rise to changes more sudden and more drastic than anything which could have been anticipated by economists by way of natural evolution. The legislation introduced by the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restriction) Act, 1915, and amended and extended in 1920 and 1923, still adversely affects the interests of owners of house property, and, indeed, the permanent interests of occupiers also. These Acts being now continued at the end of each Session in the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, there is a strong temptation to let sleeping dogs lie and not to risk a repeal which might not receive favour from the electorate. There are, however, few having real experience in the actions and reactions of this legislation, and in a position to appreciate its effect upon both owner and occupier, who would not welcome its abrogation.

Of the legislation to be gratefully remembered by owners and, incidentally, those concerned with the management of landed property, the Finance Act, 1920, stands out as the measure which repealed, with the exception of that on mineral rights, the fantastic and abortive land values duties, and extended the relief afforded by the maintenance claim to houses of a reasonably high, but still limited, annual value. The restriction on annual value of houses eligible for maintenance claims was removed entirely by the Finance Act, 1922, while the inhabited house duty was repealed by the Act of 1924.

The Finance Act, 1925, Section 23, provides that estate duty payable in respect of agricultural property shall be charged on the part of which the value is agricultural at the rate under the Finance Act, 1919, instead of at the higher rate of the later Act. This is a point to be closely watched in the settlement of valuation for death duties. On the other hand, the Finance Act, 1927, which provides for income tax, Schedule A, to be paid in one sum instead of in two instalments, cannot be looked upon as of advantage to property-owners.

Affecting the charges on land are the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, which amended the machinery of rating, as distinct from the principles upon which property is assessed for local taxation purposes. Rates are consolidated, rating areas increased in size, new rating authorities set up, all with the object of securing uniformity and insuring that one ratepayer is treated fairly in comparison with his neighbour, and one district in comparison with another district. The Act also provides for the quinquennial revision of assessments throughout the country, thus following the system which has for so long obtained in London. The changes embodied in the measure have provided an enormous amount of work for surveyors, but a more careful and uniform method of assessment has long been overdue, and there is every reason to hope that the cost of the work will prove justified. This Act was the first instalment of the important amendment of our rating and local government systems which have been foreshadowed by the present Government. The 1925 Act has been followed by the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act of the present year, which is the first legislative step to put into operation the scheme adumbrated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech for relieving agriculture and the manufacturing and freight transport industries from the increasing burden of local rates which have been crushing them. The loss to local authorities will be made good out of the Exchequer, thus indirectly carrying out a recommendation repeatedly made by The Institution that the cost of national services, though administered locally, should be distributed more evenly and borne out of national rather than out of local funds. The method adopted by the Government would seem to have the advantage of not offering an additional inducement for extravagance to the local spending authority.

A Paper will be read here on the 10th December which will provide an opportunity of discussing the recent Rating Acts in operation and the further changes which are contemplated. As a complete whole the policy of the Government provides the greatest revolution in rating and local government of our time, in some respects, indeed, since the reign of Elizabeth; in view of the fact that it is still incomplete, I need only say that it will be in the hands of the rating authorities and county councils, who will have to bear the onus of administration, and, very largely, in those of the members of the branch of our profession possessing a special and technical knowledge of rating, to make the policy a success, and to ensure that the burden of rates is distributed on an equitable and proper basis.

The Tithe Act, 1925, provided for the breaking up of what had since the war become a very burdensome and frequently inequitable co-partnership by stabilising tithe at a fixed sum of £105 per £100 commutable value, and providing for its redemption after 85 years, and by transferring the collection of tithe attached to benefices to Queen Anne's Bounty.

I cannot leave this part of my Address without a short reference to the Town Planning Acts, which will, perhaps, more than any other recent legislation affect the rights, liabilities and value of real estate.

When the policy of exercising a controlling hand over the development of land for building purposes was first adopted officially by the Legislature, we anticipated that only land ripe or approaching ripeness for building would be affected. A closer insight into the ramifications of the subject, however, has shown that town planning cannot be so restricted, and we now have regional committees in all parts of the country examining the needs of their districts from a bird's-eye point of view, co-ordinating these needs, and in so doing providing the skeleton of schemes over wide rural as well as urban areas. The laying down of main lines of communication and arterial roads, proposals for the formation of satellite towns and agricultural belts, and the linking up of smaller town planning schemes, come within the scope of these committees, and bring the activities within the range of all our practices, whether in town or country. My fear is that the public, and even many members of our own profession, have not realised the importance and the far-reaching character of this movement. So far as we ourselves are concerned, it is, in my opinion, urgent that each one of us should keep in touch with what is being done in his own district, and, by co-operation with the regional committees and town planning authorities, bring his experience and practical knowledge to bear in securing the preparation of schemes on the most progressive and useful lines.

Among the recent enactments which affect agriculture is the Agricultural Credits Acts, 1928, about the possible, or probable, benefits from which there is a good deal of difference of opinion. While its provisions for the supply of long-term loans should prove advantageous to those who have purchased their holdings, in order to justify any claim by the State to be of real assistance the rate of interest either on long or short-term credits must be reduced.

I should like particularly to refer to the various Small Holdings Acts which have been passed since 1918.

The Agricultural Committee of Northamptonshire, of which I am a member, recently received the report from the county land agent to the 25th March last. With a rent roll of £8,150 there were only £100 of arrears, and the rent roll had only been decreased by £4 in the last two and a half years.

The only section of the agricultural industry which is safeguarded is the agricultural labourer. This, of course, does not affect the smallholder, and consequently he can more successfully cope with the difficult times with which agriculture is faced. I look forward with interest to the development of small holdings by the Forestry Commissioners, whereby they will obtain the services of and guarantee work to those who are tenants of their holdings.

Apart from the question of prices, which according to the index number show an almost continuous reduction, the heavy burden of wages is the primary cause for the continuing increase of pasture and the decrease of arable farming. The natural suggestion of the urban population would be to create more small holdings, but the demand has its limits. Large holdings are being successfully farmed by those having sons to assist them, and to such an extent does this influence success that a member of our Institution recently remarked that, in letting a farm, he attributed more importance to the number of sons the applicant had than to the amount of his capital.

With regard to agriculture generally, I consider the greatest benefit that could accrue to it would be a better and closer understanding between the producer and the consumer. I deprecate the appointment of a Food Council without any representative of producers. The interests of both are identical, inasmuch as the middle man who profiteers gives too little to one and charges too much to the other. I do not for one moment suggest the elimination of the middle man, but I do suggest that a council devoid of the knowledge of the cost of production should not be asked to sit in judgment on food prices.

Companies, such as the big meat trusts of America, the amalgamation of the distributors of milk in the United Dairies, Ltd., and Sugar-Beet Factories, have too large an influence in controlling prices. The United Dairies' last balance sheet shows profits of over £500,000, an increase of £100,000 on the year, the largest yet recorded, but any addition in price to assist in meeting the cost of production is grudgingly given and passed on to the consumer.

In 1927, 222,000 acres of sugar beet were grown, but this year only 175,000. It is true that the subsidy is diminishing, and is now reduced from 19s. 6d. to 13s. per cwt. of sugar until 1931, but the companies have reduced the price to the producer, while their balance sheets show large gross profits, although their net profits are not so apparent as they place increasingly large proportions to depreciation.

Customers seldom get the benefit when agricultural prices are extremely low, as, for instance, in 1923 when the farmers obtained £2 15s. per ton for their potatoes, the retail prices were £7 per ton; and in 1924 the producer made £11, and the retail price was £14.

In spite of legislation agriculture and trade throughout the country have seldom, if ever, been worse than at the present moment. Iron and steel, coal, cotton, and the boot and hosiery industries, are all alike; productive industries and agriculture have over a million customers out of work, and taxation is paying through the dole for what they buy and not productive industry. Taxation does not create anything. Surely the time has come for the urban and agricultural population to realise that their interests are mutually interdependent, and to co-operate in meeting the difficulties with which both are faced. Unremunerative prices and lack of markets are causes of the depression by which each and all are affected, whilst heavier burdens are imposed on industry, militating further against our power of competing against other countries in our own and world markets. While the de-rating policy of the Government will afford some relief to agriculture, productive industries, and freight transport in respect of local taxation, the balance will have to be made good out of imperial taxation.

Mr. Thomas Dinwiddy, who died in March last, was a most generous supporter of our Benevolent Fund, which has benefited by over £4,000 from his benevolence. In his will, leaving over £80,000 net personalty, he said: "I have not dispensed many further charities in my will because I am financially flayed alive and dead—alive, over one-third of my income has been forfeited in income and super-tax; and dead, my family are mulcted of about one-sixth of my entire estate. The country cannot have it both ways." There is a foot-note in the Times that his will understates the death duties, which will amount to about one-fifth of the estate, and, in addition, legacy duty will be payable at rates varying from 1 per cent. in the case of children and their descendants to 10 per cent. in the case of those not of kin and institutions. Nothing could more forcibly express and bring home to us the weight of our burdens than Mr.

Dinwiddy's will, which, it must be remembered, is that of a very generous and charitably minded man.

It is clear that the enormous amount the State has to find to pay the interest on Government securities has to be found out of productive industries or capital, and productive industries that make no profits pay no taxes. The national aim must be to produce, and produce still more. It is better for a Government to help a productive industry to make a profit which can bear its share of taxation and provide employment than to add to the burdens of taxation by giving doles which encourage unemployment.

What, then, is the real cause of our present depression? Has the disease been diagnosed? Is it capable of being diagnosed, and, if so, can a cure be found?

So far as I am able to judge we must look for causes far deeper than mere seasonal or temporary variations in market conditions, and even deeper than those which must necessarily follow a world upheaval and waste of capital such as that we experienced a decade ago.

Mr. Dampier-Whetham, F.R.S., speaking as an economist, an agriculturist, and a landowner, in his Paper on "The Agricultural Depression; its Causes and possible Cure," read before The Institution in April last, diagnosed the disease as one due to currency causes. This view appears to be receiving more and more support, both from economists and from societies representing both agriculture and manufacture.

If the reversion to the gold standard by the world generally has caused a scarcity of gold and thereby has reduced the level of prices of what we produce below a remunerative level, we can only hope to retrieve our share of gold and our financial position first by the exploitation of our enormous home and colonial markets to the exclusion of other countries who are underselling us; and, secondly, having increased our volume of production thereby reducing our overhead charges, by being able to compete at a reduced level of prices with other countries in the foreign markets.

These matters concern all who are dealing with the values of real estate. They are complex in the extreme, and unfortunately owing to their complexity they do not receive the consideration which all business men should give to them, but all parties are concerned, as the values of real and personal property react upon each other.

At the time of writing this, large quantities of gold have been shipped to America and Germany, and we are threatened, if it continues, with the raising of the bank rate and dearer money.

The "City Notes" of the Times recently contained two statements on the same day, the first to the effect that over £1,000,000 in gold bars had been purchased for America; and the second a quotation from the monthly issue of the Midland Bank Magazine expressing apprehension lest the German absorption of gold will tend further to depress the world level of prices; the writer proceeding to say that "If the value of gold goes up, or, in other words, if the "general world level of commodity prices falls, then the "burden of debt payments fixed in terms of money becomes "heavier."

The position apparently is that even if the supply of gold might approximately be sufficient, notwithstanding the reversion to the gold standard by ourselves and other countries, America at present controls the supplies. A large proportion, therefore, is not being used as currency or to maintain credit, which, as far as England and other European countries are concerned, is equivalent to its being non-existent. Any hopes of attracting it from their vaults are countered by the raising of the bank rate by the New York Federal Reserve Bank, and they are influenced by, amongst other reasons, the fear of the gigantic speculation on their side in stocks and shares. This reacts on the action of the directors of the Bank of England, who, as pointed out by the Midland Bank Magazine, are fearful of the export of gold, and whose only remedy is to raise our bank rate in defence.

If the bank rate could be substantially reduced, an enormous advantage would accrue to the productive industries by helping to reduce the cost of production. It matters little to the nation what rate of interest is paid by non-productive borrowers such as speculators on our own Stock Exchange, but it is of even more importance that the cost of production should be reduced by a lower rate of interest than that the burden of rates should be reduced at the expense of the National Exchequer.

The real underlying causes of the recurring periods of deep-seated depression from which the country has suffered in the past, and is again suffering to-day, should be investigated by a Commission which would command the confidence of agriculturists, manufacturers, economists, and those engaged in finance. If the lasting prosperity of our country is found to be really bound up in this question, the permanent interests of these will not prove antagonistic.

Perhaps in England we have neglected too much the commercial side of education in agriculture as in other businesses. We should aim not only at teaching elementary scientific and technical training, but at commercial training too, the knowledge of how to market our goods.

I was much impressed when present recently, as your President, at the opening of the extension of the City of London College buildings by the commercial side of the education provided. I am glad we have a representative in Sir Edgar Harper on their Committee, which is a further indication of the deep interest taken by The Institution in educational questions, an interest extending over many years, as demonstrated by the scholarships we have founded and by the support we have given in particular to the College of Estate Management, but also to other educational centres.

In conclusion I venture to give a word of advice to the members of our Junior Organisation who, I am delighted to find, are taking such an active interest in the affairs of The Institution. It is not necessary only to pass examinations; it is necessary also, if you are to make the most of your opportunities, to take an active part in the work and conferences of your County Branches, and to exchange views with fellow-members. Attend whenever possible local excursions, and benefit by the occasion they afford of gaining practical insight into the customs in country districts or of seeing industrial works, and never fail to take advantage of the finest education of all, the widening of your knowledge and interests by travelling as opportunity occurs.

You will find in this inspiration in your work, inspiration for the advancement of your Institution, and, above all, inspiration for the furtherance of the welfare of your country.

Mr. C. HERBERT BEDELLS (Senior Vice-President) said it was both his duty and privilege to propose that a hearty vote of thanks be accorded to the President for the Address to which the members had listened with so much pleasure. Ranging as it did over so wide a field it contained points of interest to all. The President was born under a lucky star. Not only, as he had stated, was he the third of his line, not only had he had the honour of presiding over The Institution on the occasion of its Diamond Jubilee, but he also had the good fortune of being the first President to deliver his inaugural Address in what he thought all the members were agreed was the beautiful and dignified setting of the re-constructed Hall.

He was sure the members were delighted that the President had found a small space in his inaugural Address for a reference of appreciation of and thanks for the arrangements that were made in connection with the Diamond Jubilee, which worked with a smoothness and a precision which were the best testimony to the quality of the organisation which produced them; and so far as he was personally concerned, he was glad to have the opportunity of joining in that expression of thanks. He thought it might be said, to use a modern vocabulary, that the field of the history of The Institution in the past sixty years would be the "taking-off" ground for the future flights of The Institution and all the various things for which it stood. The outlook was hopeful. They were not likely to be amongst those who folded their hands contented with past achievement. Faced, as they were, with all the problems which arose from the mass of legislation, known and unknown, to which the President had referred, there was scope for all their energy and all their industry if they were to cope with the demands which would come upon them professionally, and also in meeting, so far as The Institution was concerned, the demand which the members rightly made for information and guidance on the new problems and situations which had to be dealt with. That hopeful outlook was not always the good fortune of the President for the year. He wondered whether the President and the members present remembered the story which Mr. Julian Rogers told when he was handing over the reins of government to Mr. Goddard. He referred to a predecessor in the Chair who, coming into the Lecture Hall for the purpose of delivering his inaugural Address, found that he was the only occupant of the room. The Hon. Secretary and the Secretary, of course, immediately proceeded to back up the President, but no one else was present. It was therefore decided to take the Address as read, and the three gentlemen proceeded to their homes at a much earlier stage of the evening than they had reckoned otherwise to do. Mr. Rogers went on to say that they went to their homes with feelings in which confidence in the future of The Institution could by no means be regarded as predominant. The large audience present at the meeting that evening, and the state of The Institution, would certainly not oblige the President to indulge in the dismal forebodings of his predecessor many years ago.

Turning to the Address: as the members would naturally anticipate, a great many of its paragraphs were occupied by references to agriculture. That was a field in which he was sure the members would not expect him, in proposing the vote of thanks, to stray for very long. He did, however, look to see whether the President had expressed any opinion as to what would be the effect of the resolution which was adopted in the Baltic a little while ago as to the reopening of machinery for dealing in "futures" of wheat, which it had been said in some quarters would lead ultimately to the transfer of the dominant position in the wheat-selling industry of the world from Chicago and Winnipeg to London. There was one other point with regard to agriculture to which he desired to refer. Some of the members were not agriculturists, but they had taken the opportunity, along the lines of the President's suggestion, of travelling in foreign countries, and must have noticed how much agriculture was able there to find a hand made in electricity. He was glad to see that the President in his Address looked forward to the harnessing of electrical power in that way as being within the possibility of realisation within a very short time.

A very important section of the President's Address was devoted to the legislation that had been enacted during the past eight years on the subjects of the principles and basis of valuation, rent restriction, landlord and tenant, rating and de-rating, and countless other items. All those had formed, or would in the future form, the subject of serious discussion, but it would not be appropriate for him to refer to them on the present occasion. He thought, however, when considering legislation under which people were so often inclined to say that they groaned, they ought to remember with gratitude at all events one thing which the Legislature had done for them, namely, the consolidation of the laws relating to property, which was a first step in the general consolidation of the laws which the members had to try and administer.

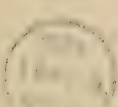

He desired to refer incidently to the President's plea on page 35 of his Paper in regard to the preservation of records of the countryside. He was much interested recently in seeing a statement, which was significant as a straw on the stream, in showing the tendency in certain of the country districts. So far as his recollection went, the incident to which he was about to refer occurred in Berkshire. Children in the elementary schools in that county had been trained to make a "Doomsday" survey of the district in which they lived. It was made on the basis of a 6-inch Ordnance map in comparison with the details that were given in the corresponding entries in the real "Doomsday Survey." So keen had been the appreciation of the children of the interest that these various details gave to them in their lives that they asked permission to be allowed to include in their returns not only the number of fields that occurred in a district, how they were occupied and the number of persons who found their livelihood there, but also the number of tame rabbits that were kept in the various homes. He thought the members would agree that that was very significant, because judging from one's own experience the love which came into a man's heart for the detailed history of his surroundings, especially of his own immediate neighbourhood, was never lost throughout the period of his life; and he thought the result of what had taken place in Berkshire would be that in the future there would be many more accurate details available to add to the interest of the country districts.

There was only one other point to which he wished to allude. The President had referred in the course of his Address to the Town Planning Acts, but he did not refer, except in a line, to a development of town planning which the members would have before them, he expected, before very long, namely, the extension of the principles of town planning to "built-up" areas. Recently in an enquiry held before the inspector of the Ministry of Health consideration was given to a scheme which was promoted by the London County Council, with which some of the members were acquainted, in connection with parts of St. Pancras and Holborn. A great many difficulties emerged which would arise in the future in the application of town planning principles to other built-up areas, with the result that, after the evidence on one side had been given, the subject was referred to the law officers of the Crown for an opinion as to whether the existing legislation was, as was contended, applicable to such built-up areas. An authoritative ruling had now been issued by the Ministry of Health that in their view existing legislation was not available for such a scheme, and therefore, he presumed, in a very short time attempts would be made to place another item on the Statute Book in addition to those which the President had mentioned, which it would be the duty of the members to digest, assimilate, and administer. With those few remarks he had much pleasure in moving "That the best thanks of The Institution be given "to the President for his most valuable and interesting "Address."

Mr. W. TIMOTHY HALL (Member of Council) said he had the honour of seconding the vote of thanks which had been so ably proposed by the previous speaker. It was no easy thing for a President fresh to his term of office to find some new theme for his Presidential Address, seeing that he had before him the Addresses of so many eminent men, all of which were a credit to the Transactions, and that in spite of the fact that the President, like the clergyman in the pulpit, was free from any fear of contradiction by the meeting gathered to hear his Address. Not that he had any wish or desire, nor would he dare, to criticise in any way what the President had said in his Address, because he was sure that every word that it contained was worthy of the many Addresses that had been given from the Chair which were recorded in the Journal of The Institution. If for no other reason the President's Address would be worthy of the highest honour, because he struck a note of duty to the profession, to the country, and to the community. He emphasised the satisfaction of work well done, both to the members themselves, and to those who employed them. But that sense of duty was not confined entirely to the surveyor; it was now spreading among the whole of the community, among landowners, among occupiers and farmers, and among all connected with landed property.

From the points to which the President had drawn their attention in the course of his Address, it would be seen that the tendency of the present time was to control the liberty of the individual for the good of the community at large. The day when the owner of a property might say, "This is my property; and can I not do what I like with my own?" had gone. He found that on every hand his own private wishes might be overridden by the greater will of the community, and that, no doubt, was a necessary state and condition of the complex machinery of modern life. The opposition of the old-time owner was probably not due to desire to keep back the wheels of progress, but to the fact that he himself wanted to be the motive power for turning those wheels of progress. He did not want it said that someone else was to make the improvements in the lives and conditions of those about him. But that state of affairs had now entirely changed. He had come to recognise that the greater will of the community must override his own individual feelings, and he realised that the machine which he wanted to move himself could only be kept going by the oil of good will and the co-operation of all concerned, so that friction and grinding and unnecessary clashes might cease. But in that control of the individual's wishes and the individual's wants it was necessary to be careful that nothing was done to destroy individuality of character. The President had referred to the strong individuality of the British character and the benefit that it had conferred on the race; and although it might be necessary to control that individuality, care should be taken not to do anything to destroy it.

The President had referred to the change in the old order, and especially to the preservation of ancient and interesting documents. He was sure the members would desire in that respect to support the President's wishes, because many of them must have hidden away in their offices most interesting and beautifully executed specimens of the surveyor's art with which present practice could not compete, because the necessary draughtsmen to do the work did not exist. He had in mind a terrier of an estate with each farm carefully plotted on parchment, and a beautiful little coloured picture of the farmhouse in the corner of each section. Such things, when estates were broken up and the plans were of no further use, should not be relegated to the scrap heap or the lumber-room, but should by all means be preserved.

The progress which was being made produced fresh problems all the time, many of which were difficult and of which the solution could not be seen at the moment. The President had referred to the difficulties of agriculture and of the basic industries resulting from the appreciation of gold. That was entirely a matter for experts, and was one on which the members of The Institution could not claim to speak. If, however, the experts were right when they said there was not enough gold to go round, and that the increase in the supply of gold would not keep pace with the increase in the demands for gold due to the increase of population and the increase of production, it was obvious that drastic steps must be taken to correct the evil; and he heartily supported the President in his statement that the whole matter was one which required most careful consideration and enquiry by a commission of experts who possessed the complete confidence of the country.

Speaking of experts, he could not help feeling, in looking back over past years, that the growth of the expert in their profession compared with what might be termed the general practitioner had become more marked every year. A member could not expect to be expert in all subjects, but it was obvious that all those connected with estates and landed property should at least have a general working knowledge, so that they might be able to appreciate and give due weight to the opinions of the experts when they were called in to advise on any particular subject. The training and the examinations instituted by The Institution not only encouraged the wide view which should be taken of the subjects with which individual members had to deal, but they further encouraged pursuit of the highest ideals, such as had been impressed upon them by the President. In thinking about the Address in days to come, he thought the members would feel that the President's words upon devotion to duty, efficiency, and the satisfaction to all concerned of good work well done, would be the dominant note of the Address of 1928. He had great pleasure in seconding the vote of thanks.

The resolution of thanks was put to the meeting by Mr. BEDELLS, and carried with acclamation.

The PRESIDENT said he was deeply grateful to Mr. Bedells and Mr. Hall for the kind way in which they had proposed and seconded the vote of thanks, and the members for the hearty manner in which it had been passed. It was very difficult, as Mr. Hall had remarked, to choose the lines upon which one desired as President to address the members, and it became more complicated the more one thought about it. In preparing his Address the only object he had in mind was to provide a basis of thought to the members, and especially the Junior Members, in connection with their duties to The Institution, the work with which they were connected, the effect of legislation upon their actions and upon the values of property and the financial condition of the country at the present moment; and he only hoped that the thoughts he had expressed would lead the members to consider further and more deeply the very pressing questions with which they were all engaged at the present time. Mr. Bedells had referred to the question of whether the Baltic proposed to establish a wheat market in Mark Lane. Personally that was a form of speculation which he would most strongly condemn. He was an agriculturist, and agriculturists were always told in the autumn that the prices of wheat were going up because of the great scarcity which the promoters of speculation in wheat thought existed. They always raised the hopes of agriculturists so that the prices rose before the harvest; but after the harvest, when the wheat was marketed, it was found that the reverse was the case. Mr. Bedells had also referred to the question of the harnessing of electric power, a question which was very much more in the limelight than it was some few years ago. In his own district many villages now possessed the advantages of electric light. He knew of a very nice farmhouse which at one time had no sanitary arrangements, no bath, and no accommodation of that sort at all. It now had electric light, an electric pump, a hot and cold-water bath, the water being heated by electricity. All those things conduced to an improvement in the value of property and the amenities of country life. In conclusion he again thanked the members most cordially for the kind way in which the vote of thanks had been moved and carried. He would feel sustained in carrying out his duties during the year by the kindness of the members on the present occasion.

PAPER 516.

THE RECENT RATING ACTS IN OPERATION.

By Francis G. Fleury (Professional Associate) (Special Diploma in Rating).

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 10th December, 1928.

I think it will be of assistance if I indicate at the outset the scope of this Paper, and I cannot find better words for this purpose than those employed by the Council of The Institution when they asked me—

“ . . . to prepare a Paper . . . to cover points arising under the 1925 Act with some reference to the Apportionment Act of this year, and, possibly, the proposals for reform in local government . . . so far as they deal with highway administration or other matters peculiarly of interest to the surveyor.”

The legislation covered by this request is fourfold, consisting of—

The Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 ;

The Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 ;

The Local Government Bill, 1928 ;

Commencing with the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and dealing with the Act in logical sequence, one should start with the Preamble. The first objective of the Act, as set out therein, is that it is “ to simplify and amend the law “ with respect to the making and collection of rates.” This might, perhaps, be regarded as a matter somewhat outside the professional interest of a surveyor, and as, in addition, I think I am justified in saying that the inauguration of one consolidated rate in place of the two or more previously levied, and the transference to borough and district councils of the duty of levying the rate, are generally regarded as not only "simplification" but as improvements, there seems little need to say more.

The two other principal points mentioned in the Preamble are that the Act is designed "to promote uniformity in the valuation of property for the purpose of rates," and to "amend the law with respect to the valuation of machinery."

The attempt to secure uniformity has been made in two ways. First, by enacting that a new valuation list shall be prepared by all the rating authorities throughout England and Wales, to come into force on either the 1st April, 1928, or the 1st April, 1929, and thereafter at intervals of five years, and, secondly, by the setting-up of County Valuation Committees to promote uniformity within the counties, and of a Central Valuation Committee, with power to promulgate recommendations, to promote uniformity throughout the country generally.

Considering the first of these methods, the preparation of the new valuation list, it is a well-known proverb that you can lead a horse to the water but you cannot make him drink. Within the knowledge of the writer quite a number of rating authorities, mostly in rural areas, or the more remote urban areas, have copied out their old valuation list, and termed that the new "draft valuation list" — an easy and economical way of dealing with troublesome Acts of Parliament.

With regard to the second method, the setting up of the County and Central Valuation Committees, the utility of this will be dealt with when certain of the recommendations of the latter body are more specifically considered.

The law with respect to the valuation of machinery has been amended by inserting in the Act Section 24, which enacts that in the valuation of a hereditament containing machinery (excluding public utility undertakings) only such plant shall be deemed to be a part of the hereditament as is specified in the Third Schedule of the Act. This Third Schedule I do not propose setting out here, because under the same section of the Act the Minister of Health had power to set up a Committee "to prepare a statement setting out in detail all the machinery and plant which appeared to them to fall within any of the classes of the said Schedule." After this Committee had prepared their statement, the Minister had power to make an order confirming it, with or without modification, and "the statement as confirmed by the order" should "for all purposes have effect as if it were substituted for the Third Schedule to" the Act. This procedure has been carried out, and so in place of the Third Schedule we have "The Plant and Machinery (Valuation for Rating) Order, 1927."

This order is generally so well known that there is no need for me to comment upon it; but I may mention that it follows the original Third Schedule in dividing the machinery to be deemed part of the hereditament into four classes.

There has been a conflict of opinion as to whether the definition under Class 1 (a) of the order of "Main transmission of power" includes or excludes electric motors used for driving machinery or shafting. It is only these motors used for this work which are in doubt; the inclusion of motors used for generation of power is not questioned.

The definition of "main transmission of power" as given in the order is "all transmission of power from the generating plant or point or points of supply in or on the hereditament up to and including—

- "(i.) Where power is transmitted to any other hereditament, the point or points at which power passes from the hereditament;
- "(ii.) Where power is transmitted by means of shafting or gear wheels, any shaft or shafts or gear wheel or wheels which is or are directly driven by means of belts, ropes, gear or other means from the shaft, pulley, drum, driving wheel, or gear of the prime mover;
- "(iii.) Where electrical power is transmitted by means of a cable or cables, the main distribution board or boards to which the cables from the generator or generators or point or points of supply is or are led either directly or with the intervention of a transformer or transformers, and whose bus bars carry or are intended to carry electrical energy at the pressure at which the power distribution circuits are supplied;

“(iv.) Where hydraulic or pneumatic power is transmitted by means of a pipe or pipes, the point or points where the main supply ceases excluding any branch service piping connected with such main piping.”

The point turns upon whether each of these divisions is to be regarded as a complete entity to itself or to be read in conjunction with the remaining three.

I suggest the former is correct, and that the divisions apply—

- (i.) to power generally;
- (ii.) to power generated by steam, gas, oil, hot and compressed air engines, water turbines, &c.;
- (iii.) to electrical power;
- (iv.) to hydraulic and pneumatic power.

On this interpretation electric motors would be excluded, as under (iii.) electric power ceases at the switchboard.

The argument for the inclusion of electric motors contends that (ii.) in addition to (i.) applies generally, and that an electric motor is covered by the definition “prime mover”; it is then suggested that (iii.) is additional to (ii.) and does not override it, it being contended that under (iii.) the cables and switchboard are included, and under (ii.) the motor and shafting.

Counsel’s opinion has been taken on this point, and is against the inclusion of such electric motors.

Class 4, which concerns “plant or a combination of plant and machinery whenever and to such extent as any such plant is, or is in the nature of a building or structure,” is highly contentious, the difficulty being in defining a "building or structure," and already at Portsmouth a case has been decided by one of the panel of referees appointed by the Lord Chief Justice, under powers conferred by the 1925 Act, to determine such disputes.

There is one point in connection with the functions of referees to which I would like to draw attention, and that is that there is no provision in the Act for keeping their decisions on uniform lines. As the decisions of the referees are final and conclusive, it is quite possible that in different parts of the country two different referees may give widely varying decisions on similar questions.

Having now dealt with the Preamble, let us consider the Act. So far as the Act itself is concerned, it is intended to have little effect upon the principles of valuation for rating, Section 64 (1) stating that "Subject as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, nothing therein contained shall affect (a) the principles on which hereditaments are to be valued or any privilege or any provisions for the making of a valuation on any exceptional principle."

As I cannot deal at length with all the provisions of the Act, I feel that it would help to stimulate discussion more if I deal principally with the more contentious points in order that we may have the benefit of different opinions upon them.

For facility of reference I propose dealing with the different sections in their numerical order.

Section 22 (a) provides that in the case of hereditaments belonging to one of the classes specified in the first column of the table contained in Part I. of the Second Schedule of the Act the net annual value is to be obtained by deducting from the gross value, ascertained in accordance with the definition in the Act, the percentage given in that table. For facility of reference these classes are set out as follows:—

- (1) Houses and buildings without land, other than gardens, where the gross value does not exceed £10 ;
- (2) Houses and buildings without land, other than gardens, where the gross value exceeds £10 but does not exceed £20 ;

- (3) Houses and buildings without land, other than gardens, where the gross value exceeds £20 but does not exceed £40;
- (4) Houses and buildings without land, other than gardens, where the gross value exceeds £40 but does not exceed £100;
- (5) Houses and buildings without land, other than gardens, where the gross value exceeds £100;
- (6) Land (other than agricultural land) with buildings valued together therewith as one hereditament;
- (7) Land (other than agricultural land) without buildings;
- (8) Agricultural land.

The wording of the note to this table is of importance, stating that the "expression 'houses and buildings' does not include mills, manufactories or premises of a similar character used wholly or mainly for industrial purposes, or hereditaments valued as part of any railway, dock, canal, gas, water, electricity, or other public utility undertaking."

I would like to draw attention to the following extract from a Memorandum by the Rating Surveyors' Association:—

"In the opinion of the Association there are, without doubt, many classes of hereditaments which do not fall either within Classes 1–8 of the Second Schedule, or are contained in the wording of the note to Part I. of the Second Schedule. The valuation lists made, or now being made, show that valuers and rating authorities experience considerable difficulty in deciding in what class certain particular properties should be placed, or whether they should be included within the note to the schedule. With this great difficulty it is clear that uniformity is not and cannot be obtained. The Association therefore consider that the earliest opportunity should be taken of amending Part I. of the Second Schedule."

An example of this difficulty can be seen in the recent case at the Bedfordshire Quarter Sessions dealing with glasshouses, where it was decided that glasshouses do not come within the table contained in Part I. of the Second Schedule.

Doubt has been expressed as to whether the term "houses and buildings" is to be interpreted as meaning "houses with buildings" or "houses and/or buildings." It would appear that light is thrown on this doubt by the recent alteration to the first five classes of the Third Schedule of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. These originally were:—

Class 1.—Houses and buildings, or either of them, without land other than gardens where the gross value is under £20.

Class 2.—Houses and buildings without land other than gardens and pleasure grounds valued therewith for the purpose of inhabited house duty where the gross value is £20 and under £40.

Class 3.—Houses and buildings without land other than gardens and pleasure grounds valued therewith for the purpose of inhabited house duty where the gross value is £40 or upwards.

Class 4.—Buildings without land which are not liable to inhabited house duty and are of a gross value of £20 and under £40.

Class 5.—Buildings without land which are not liable to inhabited house duty and are of a gross value of £40 or upwards.

The Rating and Valuation Act, 1928, substitutes for these five classes five different classes whose wording is identical with that given in the first column of the table given in Part I. of the Second Schedule of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925. These definitions must necessarily cover the same hereditaments as the classes under the 1869 Act for which they are substituted covered, and therefore in London the words "houses and buildings" must mean "houses and/or buildings." From that the conclusion can be drawn that as one set of words can have only one meaning, the definition of "houses and buildings" as used in the 1925 Act must be "houses and/or buildings."

The method of determining whether or not a gross value need be shown is, according to the Act, a method of elimination, as the method of estimating "net annual value" only applies "If the hereditament is not such a hereditament "as is mentioned" in paragraph (a) "which deals with hereditaments mentioned in the first column of the table "in Part I. of the Second Schedule. This is further supported by the Rating and Valuation Act (Form of Valuation List) Rules, 1926, which, in setting forth instructions "for the entry of hereditaments in the valuation list, state, "in respect of column 7, no entry in respect of gross value "shall be made in the case of a hereditament not belonging "to any of the classes specified in Part I. of the Second "Schedule to the Act."

Section 22 (b) provides that in the case of those hereditaments for which a gross value is not required to be shown—

"There shall be estimated the rent at which the hereditament might reasonably be expected to let from year to year if the tenant undertook to pay all usual tenant's rates and taxes and tithe rent-charges, if any, and to bear the cost of the repairs and the insurance and the other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the hereditament in a state to command that rent," the rent so estimated being deemed the net annual value.

Under the old definitions of "gross estimated rental" and "rateable value" the hypothetical landlord was assumed to bear the cost of the repairs and insurance, and the question arises as to whether, under the definition just quoted of "net annual value" this burden has been transferred to the hypothetical tenant. The question assumes considerable importance in the valuation of public utility undertakings, as, if the tenant is responsible for the repairs and insurance, he should be allowed an amount to provide for this in the working expenses included in tenant's capital.

Under the old law such a demand could not be made, and the obvious reply when such an allowance is asked for would appear to be Section 64 (1) (a), which was quoted earlier. To this two rejoinders can be made: First, that the terms of the definition of "net annual value" do "expressly provide" within the meaning of Section 64 (1), and, secondly, if it be held that that contention is wrong, that the calculation of the tenant's capital is not a "principle" within the meaning of that section. It is, I think, common ground between the holders of both points of view that the 1925 Act was not intended to make any alteration such as this; but the instances are numerous in which Acts of Parliament, through faulty draughtsmanship, do not give effect to the intentions of Parliament when passing the legislation. My own view is that the definition of "net annual value" does not "expressly provide" an alteration in the method of computing tenant's capital. For any alteration to be "expressly" provided, within the meaning of the section, I am of the opinion that it is necessary that a section in the Act should clearly provide for such alteration and not merely by inference. On the second point, while the term "principle" would generally refer to methods such as the "contractor's" or "profits," yet I am of the opinion that—as the greater must include the lesser—so must, in the reading of this Act, the whole of a principle be taken.

A section upon which there has been considerable discussion, and upon which there is likely to be considerable difference of opinion, is No. 23. This section sets forth that—

"Where a building which was constructed or has been adapted for the purposes of a single dwelling-house or as to part thereof for such purpose, and as to the remainder thereof for any purpose other than that of a dwelling or residence, is occupied in parts, the rating authority or the assessment committee in preparing, or revising, a draft valuation list, or in amending a current valuation list, may, if they think fit, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the extent, if any, to which the parts separately occupied have been severed by structural alterations, treat the building or any portion thereof as a single hereditament, and a building or portion of a building so treated as a single hereditament shall, for the purposes of rating, be deemed to be a single hereditament in the occupation of the person who receives the rents payable in respect of the parts."

In rating law the occupier is the person to be rated, so that when there is exclusive occupation of a part there is separate rateability of that part. This section, it is submitted, is designed to meet the case of those large houses which are let, without structural severance, to two or more families, and to enable the rating authority to make one assessment on the whole house and rate the owner for same.

It should be noted that this section does not apply to a building which is constructed to be let in flats, each of which must continue to be separately assessed; nor, in the opinion of Mr. Konstam, expressed in his Modern Law of Rating, page 38, does it apply to a dwelling-house in a part of which the owner who receives the rents lives, or a dwelling-house of which parts are owned by different persons.

The first contentious point that arises is the basis of assessment. The case is frequently cited of two similar houses adjoining one another, the one is occupied in parts, and the other occupied as a single dwelling-house. In the majority of cases the rateable value of the different portions of the house occupied in parts, if arrived at separately and totalled together, will exceed the rateable value of the house occupied as a single dwelling, and the question is, If the rating authority decide to assess the house occupied in parts as a single hereditament under the provision of this section, should the assessment have regard to the fact that the house is let in parts, or must it compare with the assessment of the house occupied and assessed as a single dwelling? In other words, If the rating authority assess the house occupied in parts at a higher figure than the house occupied by one tenant, can the landlord of the former house object on the grounds of inequality? My own view is that this section was intended to provide easier collection of rates and not to affect valuation, and that a rating authority are entitled to value a house occupied in parts as being so occupied although they insert such valuation in the valuation list as for a single hereditament; but that to show what they have done, and to protect themselves against such an objection as that just cited, they should indicate by the description in the valuation list that the valuation refers to a house occupied in parts. In making a valuation of a house let in parts it must be remembered that, if one assessment is made, rates will have to be paid even if a part is vacant, and consideration should be given to this.

That these notes on the 1925 Act deal so largely with controversial matter is my excuse for mentioning Sections 27 and 37, which deal with the draft and current valuation lists respectively. Under the old law an assessment committee, on hearing an objection, had no power to increase an assessment. Section 27 (2) states that an assessment committee, on their revision of the draft list, may "make such alterations, insertions and corrections in the list whether for the purpose of meeting an objection or for any other reasons as they think proper."

From this it would appear that, on an objection to the draft list, the assessment committee have power to increase an assessment if they so desire. Section 37 (6) dealing with proposals for the amendment of a current valuation list sets forth that "the assessment committee shall hear and determine any proposal as if it were an objection to a draft list, and all the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act relating to the hearing and determining of such an objection shall apply accordingly." It would therefore appear that, if the assessment committee have powers on determining objections to increase an assessment, they have equal power on determining a proposal.

The opinion is held that what I have stated is incorrect and that an assessment committee have no power to increase an assessment in these circumstances. Possibly this question will be dealt with in the discussion.

There is one point I would like to raise before considering some of the representations of the Central Valuation Committee, and that is the omission from the Act of some method of co-ordinating the decisions of Quarter Sessions. As is well known, there is no appeal against the decision of Quarter Sessions on what are termed questions of fact; but some of these questions of fact are equally questions of principle, which can perhaps best be indicated by an example. On the question of the rate of interest to be allowed on tenant's capital in the valuation of a public utility undertaking, I admit that it might not be advisable that a uniform rate should be laid down to be applied indiscriminately; but, taking one large public utility undertaking stretching into the area of perhaps half a dozen courts of Quarter Session, each of these courts has power to adopt a different rate of interest, yet it is obvious that in reality the rate should be the same throughout. Those present can readily instance cases where it would make both for simplification and uniformity if some such co-ordination could be obtained.

Under the 1925 Act Quarter Sessions has power to delegate the hearing of appeals to a committee of whom not less than five nor more than seven members shall be engaged in the hearing of any appeal. This may, perhaps, serve as an excuse for bringing up the question as to whether Quarter Sessions, even considered as a whole, much less as a committee, is the best medium for determining some of the more complicated appeals, and whether a court somewhat on the lines of the Admiralty Court, with a judge and two or more professional assessors, would not be a sounder body. If such a court ever came into being, I would go further and suggest that certain classes of hereditaments, such as public utility undertakings, should be scheduled as hereditaments for which it was not necessary to object before an assessment committee, but that appeal should be entered straight away to the court.

A little earlier I mentioned the Central Valuation Committee. This Committee was set up, under Section 57 of the Act, for "the purpose of promoting uniformity in valuation." It is important to note that purpose, for that is the standard by which the Central Valuation Committee must be judged. It will be remembered that one of the purposes of the Act, as set out in the Preamble, was to "promote uniformity," and, as stated, the establishment of this Committee is one of the means by which it is hoped to attain uniformity. This being so, the standard by which this Committee's recommendations must be judged is whether or no they help to secure uniformity, and in this light I propose considering a few of their 62 Representations.

Before actually considering these Representations, there is another aspect of the Central Valuation Committee's activities to which I would like to draw attention, and that is this: This Committee, although established by statute, has no statutory powers to enforce its opinions, its sole power being to recommend. When the present Act was first introduced into Parliament, the responsible Minister stated that the establishment of this Committee without any actual power was regarded as an experiment which, if successful, might be repeated in other directions.

The first Representations that I would like to draw attention to are those that recommend the adopting of a basis of valuation of certain types of hereditaments by County Conferences. The Central Valuation Committee in a sense commenced this in Representation 25, when they suggested—"That the County Valuation Committee, in co-operation with any county borough councils in the geographical county, be recommended to call a conference of representatives of the rating and assessment authorities for that county, with a view to securing as wide a uniformity as possible in the practice of assessing town halls, parish halls, public offices, workhouses, hospitals, sanatoria, asylums, schools, libraries, art galleries, baths and wash-houses, fire stations, sewers, and other non-productive properties in the occupation of local authorities."

It will be observed that this Conference was "with a view to securing as wide a uniformity as possible."

Had the Central Valuation Committee stopped there they might not have been so open to criticism. Later, when they come to Representation 54, they go a step further, and, in my opinion, a step too far. This representation deals with—

Hospitals (including dispensaries) mainly supported by voluntary contributions ;

Charitable institution (e.g., almshouses, orphanages, and institutions for the blind, deaf, and dumb) ;

Village halls, village institutes, and village clubs (other than registered clubs in which intoxicating liquor is supplied).

I should have mentioned earlier that under powers conferred upon them by the Act the Central Valuation Committee set up panels of experts to advise them on the representations they should make respecting certain classes of hereditaments.

In the case of the hereditaments enumerated above, the Central Valuation Committee states that their representation is formulated after consulting with the panel of experts.

The representation, briefly, is this: First, that each County Valuation Committee should call a conference similar to that suggested in Representation 25 for non-productive properties occupied by local authorities; but that in the case of these hereditaments the County Conference should “arrive at a basis,” such basis to be adopted “throughout the area of the county for the assessment of properties of these classes.” The representation then goes on to suggest that to enable the Conference to arrive at a basis the County Valuation Committee should in advance obtain “adequate information as to all properties of these classes.” I propose for the moment to refrain from commenting on the practical impossibility of obtaining “adequate” information without inspection. The Central Valuation Committee then suggest as the information to be obtained in the case of hospitals—

- (i.) The rateable value according to the current valuation list ;
- (ii.) The number of beds, distinguishing “paying” from “free” beds ;

- (iii.) The description and extent of buildings used otherwise than for accommodation of in-patients;
- (iv.) The extent of land occupied with the hospital;
- (v.) Any restrictions in the uses of the property;
- (vi.) Any other particulars relevant to the settlement of a basis of assessment.

They then go on to state that, in considering a basis, rating and assessment authorities must remember that "the practical question on which they are called upon to determine is what would be a reasonable annual rent if the particular property was in the market to let for the purpose for which it is at present being used"; and, further, that in considering such rent regard must be had to—

- (a) the purposes for which the property is actually used, and its fitness for those purposes;
- (b) that it has in the past been the established practice of rating and assessment authorities in assessing such properties to take into account the fact that the present occupiers can be regarded as possible tenants only so long as they are able to rely upon voluntary contributions from the general public to enable them to continue the occupation and use of such properties for hospital, social, educational and other beneficent purposes; and
- (c) all the responsibilities, conditions, restrictions and circumstances under which the voluntary organisation continues in occupation of the property."

I must really apologise for taking up so much time with hospitals, but I am doing it for the purpose of pointing a moral.

My first point is that, from the information which the Central Valuation Committee suggest should be obtained upon which the basis is to be arrived at, it is obvious that they are suggesting a method of assessment which is really substituting "rule of thumb" for true valuation, and nothing is more dangerous or likely to create anomalies.

The second point is that I am afraid rating authorities can read this representation only as a very broad hint that in the basis adopted should be perpetuated the present common system of placing nominal assessments on these hereditaments. Every rating surveyor knows that this is contrary to law; and the Central Valuation Committee know it too, because if one turns to the "Summary of Replies" to the questionnaire which the Central Valuation Committee issued to rating authorities, it will be observed that reference is made to "the true annual value of the institution (e.g., on "the contractor's principle"); and, again, it is stated there that "a number of authorities urge that either the assessment of voluntary hospitals should be in accordance with the law, or the law should be amended so as to permit of preferential treatment."

In comparison with the total number and diverse types of hereditaments subject to local rates, hospitals do not rank as very important; but the Central Valuation Committee have shown in this representation what I can only describe as moral cowardice. They appear to have considered (and quite properly, I consider) that the present law is unfair; but instead of recommending an alteration of the present law, they suggest that it should be evaded. Were this the only case in which they do this, I would not have stressed the point so strongly; but, as I hope to show later, this is not the only case.

Before considering whether this representation promotes uniformity, I want to deal with another representation, No. 56, which refers to public, elementary and secondary schools. Here, again, the Committee states that their representation is made after consultation with the panel of experts. In this representation, after reviewing the present position, the Committee suggest certain future practice. The first suggestion deals with the question of assessing separately playing fields, and is not of sufficient importance to warrant discussion here. Following that, the representation refers to R. v. School Board of London (1886), 17 Q.B.D., 738; 50 J.P., 419; 55 L.J.M.C., 33, 169; 55 L.T., 384; and points out that this judgment only indicates that the "contractor's "principle" may be used for assessing this class of hereditament, and that the Court did not decide that it must be used to the exclusion of any other method.

The representation then sets forth certain particulars which should be considered in arriving at the gross value. After this it is suggested that if the "contractor's principle" is applied, a reasonable commercial rate of interest should be applied to the effective capital value of the premises. The crux of the representation lies in the two concluding sub-sections, which I propose setting out:—

"(4) (d) If, from the use of the "contractor's principle," or any other test, there should emerge figures which can be so applied as to provide an amount per school place (according to the accommodation as certified by the Board of Education) within a defined area (e.g., a county), such an amount should, in practice, be applied with care, and be subject to periodical review.

"(e) The practical application of an amount per school place should form the subject of discussion at the conferences referred to in this Committee's previous resolutions . . . With a view of assisting the Conference the Court of Valuations Committee should in advance obtain from the rating authorities, . . . and circulate to the members of the Conference, such information as is readily available showing the accommodation of the school, the rateable values according to existing valuation lists, and other relevant particulars."

It will be observed that the Central Valuation Committee, at the commencement of (4) (d), have inserted the words "from the use of the 'contractor's principle' or any other test" (the italics are my own). I would suggest that if this representation is to be of any practical assistance in enabling rating authorities to proceed on uniform lines, the nature of these other tests should be stated. What are they? It will also be noted that from the concluding paragraph (e) the Central Valuation Committee are again giving countenance to valuation by "rule of thumb."

Now to consider these Representations as of practical assistance towards securing uniformity. The most important point is that all are directed towards securing uniformity within counties. So far as I am aware, no action has been taken to secure uniformity between county and county, and what is the result? The greater number of the counties have laid down scales for the valuation of hereditaments of these classes which show the widest variation even in adjoining counties. This is illustrated in the following table which show the figures on which certain county conferences have suggested the assessments of the hereditaments enumerated below should be assessed :—

COUNTY.	HOSPITALS (per bed).	ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (per place).		SECONDARY SCHOOLS (per place).
		Under 100 places.	Over 100 places.

When dealing with the Representations as to the assessment of hospitals, I mentioned that in several instances the Central Valuation Committee appeared to be wrong in law. Another instance of this is seen in No. 57, where, in considering the assessment of registered clubs in which intoxicating liquor is supplied, the Committee states that it " notes that there is a considerable demand for an alteration of the law which will remove doubts as to whether “rating and assessment authorities may, in assessing registered clubs, properly have regard to the volume of the supply of intoxicating liquors therein.”

I am afraid I do not understand where they get their “doubt” from. Registered clubs have no liquor licence, no monopoly attaches to the hereditament, and no regard can be paid to the amount of liquor sold therein. The fact that the Committee state that there is a doubt is a direct temptation to rating authorities to attempt to take advantage of the doubt by increasing the amount of the assessment to cover a supposed enhancement due to the sales of intoxicating liquors.

In the case of this representation, as in the case of the others quoted, the Committee state that it was only formulated after consultation with the panel of experts. In their letter to the Minister of Health for wording the series of Representations of which those quoted form a part it is stated “It will thus be seen that the Representations now made are the result of long deliberation by ourselves and by the panel of experts.”

It is difficult to conceive that some of these Representations are actually based on the opinions of experts—it must be remembered that the panels include some very eminent rating surveyors—as some of the views expressed are at such considerable variance with the views expressed by these surveyors in other circumstances that one is led to doubt whether the Committee in their Representations have not either considerably altered or else departed from the views of their panel of experts.

It is significant that the Committee never compromise themselves further than to say that the representation is made after consultation with the panel, excepting in the case of coal mines, where they state that they adopt the report of the panel of experts.

In the cases of the other Representations surely it would be of great assistance if the Central Valuation Committee were to publish the actual report of the panel of experts upon which the Representations were based. If they did this, perhaps it might prevent the fair fame of some rating surveyors being unjustly smirched.

The concluding representation with which I propose dealing in any detail is No. 50, which concerns coal mines. This is probably one of the most important, as it concerns what is collectively one of the largest ratepayers in the country and an industry which is the base of England's industrial life. As I mentioned earlier, the Committee state that they have adopted the report of the panel of experts; but I must confess that in certain respects "I hae "ma doots."

Generally speaking this Representation is well set out, clear and concise, but it appears to me to be contrary to law on two points.

The first point is this: The Committee recommend "that the assessments of coal mines should be revised "annually on an output basis; and that the estimate of "the out-put should be based on the average of the annual "output of two previous years, due regard being had to all "other relevant circumstances. It is felt that such a "method will, subject to the adoption of fair and proper "rates per ton, prove equitable in practice."

The point which they do not emphasise—indeed, do not actually mention—is that in law the basis of assessment is the output for the ensuing year. While a method based on the previous year's out-put may be equitable for a certain period over a certain number of years, it must at some stage break down, and is especially likely to do so when it works against the occupier's interest.

The Central Valuation Committee should have clearly pointed out to rating authorities that a method of annual assessment on the past year's output is only a measure of convenience and must be regarded as such.

The real legal position appears to have entirely escaped the Central Valuation Committee—and also their panel of experts if this representation is really their report—for later we find the Central Valuation Committee saying—

"There will be cases (e.g., coal mines which having been closed for a considerable period are being reopened, and coal mines which have been newly planted and from which coal has not been previously got) where such evidence of output as is referred to above will not be available ; in such cases the estimate of output must be based on reasonable expectations until the actual evidence becomes available."

This might be taken to imply that in the case of a newly opened coal mine the Central Valuation Committee suggest that, immediately the first year of working is past, the assessment for the second year should be based on the first year's output. In actual fact, in the majority of cases, the second year's output of a new coal mine far exceeds the first.

What is to happen with a mine that is almost worked out? According to the Central Valuation Committee the assessment for the last year would be based on the output for the previous year, although actually only a tenth of the coal raised during the previous year may remain in the mine to be raised during the year of assessment.

I am quite prepared to admit that these disadvantages to the Central Valuation Committee's representation would not be nearly so weighty if they had the powers to insist that a basis of assessment on the previous year's output be rigidly applied. They have not this power, such a basis can only be applied—and can only work equitably—by mutual agreement.

It is quite obvious that a colliery that has not entered into an agreement is not going to permit an assessment based on the previous year's output during the last year of working if the coal mine is practically worked out. If, then, half the collieries agree and half do not, where is the uniformity?

The second legal point I want to make is that the Central Valuation Committee appear to have completely overlooked the judgment in Tanfield Overseers v. Durham County Council (1923), 2 K.B., 333. The head-note to this case states :—

"Under a practice which had always been in force in all the unions of the county of Durham an assessment committee assessed a colliery upon the basis of the actual output of coal during the previous twelve months, during which period long strikes had taken place. The county council, in making the county rate basis, refused to follow the practice, and insisted that this was not a fair and proper method for that year of assessment, as an hypothetical tenant would expect a cessation of strife and an increased output. Quarter Sessions held that the practice should have been followed.

Held, that Quarter Sessions were wrong, and that the true basis is what a tenant would give in the coming year."

In view of this judgment it is a little odd to find the Committee saying "... the abnormal conditions arising out of the coal stoppage in 1926 shall be kept in view, so that the occupier who has already had full relief in respect of that period shall not have this relief repeated."

May one ask, what relief?

There is a further point: Suppose the previous year's output basis is strictly adhered to and in the year following a strike, when the assessments are reduced, the occupier of another hereditament objects to the assessments of the coal mines, what then?

Space does not permit any more than touching upon two other Representations, the first of which is generally considered contrary to law and the second of which is not, in my opinion, likely to secure uniformity.

The first is the series of Representations dealing with sporting rights (Nos. 39 and 60). Here the Committee recommend that, until the High Court otherwise decides, the rateable value of the sporting right should be shown separately from that of the land over which such right is exercised. This, it is contended, is contrary to Section 6 (1) of the Rating Act, 1874, and there is no need for a High Court decision to prove it.

The second is No. 53, dealing with advertising stations. Admittedly the law is so complicated as to render compliance with it extremely difficult; but is it wise for the Committee to recommend a course which they know is contrary to the law and suggest that rating authorities should "agree with the owners of the parent hereditament" in such illegal action? Supposing one-half the owners agree and the other half do not, where is the uniformity? Had the Committee stuck to the existing law (while pressing for reform) they could have insisted on it being obeyed, and avoided any risk; but this suggestion they cannot insist on.

From the foregoing the conclusion may be drawn that I am opposed to the Central Valuation Committee. In actual fact nothing is further from the truth, as I consider that the vast majority of their Representations are not only of great assistance to rating authorities, but have gone to ensure that the first revaluation will be the more thoroughly carried out, and will secure greater uniformity that would otherwise have been the case.

Such criticism as I have directed against certain of their Representations has been directed solely because I consider that all the Representations of a body of such weight and importance should be as free as possible from error.

The foregoing concludes all the remarks I propose making upon the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925.

One turns to the Rating and Valuation Act, 1928, almost with a sense of relief at its shortness and conciseness, it consisting of but five sections and two schedules. The fact that this Act has not been dealt with previously in a Paper read before The Institution is my excuse for setting out in slight detail its provisions.

Section 1 applies to London the provisions of Section 24 of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, providing that after the 6th April, 1929, in the valuation of hereditaments containing plant or machinery only such plant and machinery as is deemed part of the hereditament under the provisions of the 1925 Act shall be included. While London is thus brought into equality with the provinces so far as the rating of machinery is concerned, I am not aware that there are any provisions rendering unnecessary in London the showing of a gross value for those hereditaments for which in the provinces the provisions of the 1925 Acts has rendered this unnecessary.

Section 2 amends the Third Schedule of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, by substituting for Classes 1 to 5 of that schedule the classes contained in Part I. of the First Schedule to this Act. It also amends the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, by substituting for Classes 1 and 2 of Part I. of the Second Schedule of that Act the classes contained in Part II. of the First Schedule of this Act, and thus the classes for "houses and buildings without land other than gardens" are for both London and the provinces identical.

This section further slightly amends London procedure by providing that in subsequent valuation lists fractions of a pound in the rateable value are to be disregarded, thus in small detail bringing London into line with the provinces.

Section 4 amends the allowance to owners who are rated under Section 11 (1) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, from the 10 per cent. allowable under that section to an amount between 10 and 15 per cent. to be determined by the rating authority. This section also amends Section 11 (10) of the 1925 Act by granting rating authorities powers to continue in force provisions contained in local Acts with respect to the rating of owners instead of occupiers, the procedure for doing this being set out in the Second Schedule.

Section 5 contains the short title of the Act, and also defines its relationship to the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925.

Having concluded the consideration of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1928, one passes from the consideration of questions affecting rating in its ordinary sense to the consideration of the legislation intended to give effect to what are popularly termed the "Budget's Rating Proposals."

The only Act at present in this category is the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928. This Act confers no actual relief from rates to any hereditament, but sets in motion part of the machinery by which such relief, when conferred by the Local Government Bill of 1928, will operate.

The Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, provides that—

- (1) Agricultural hereditaments,
- (2) Industrial hereditaments,
- (3) Freight transport hereditaments, are to be distinguished in the valuation list from other hereditaments. Definitions of these hereditaments are given, and it is, in my opinion, to be regretted that both in the definitions and in the general body of the Act a large use is made of cross-reference, entailing reference by the peruser to five previous Acts in order to understand the English portion alone.

In addition to the definitions there are lengthy sections dealing with dates, objections, appeals, the powers of the revenue officer and the like, all of which are of great importance.

I regret I have not the space to deal with this Act in the manner I would have liked, especially as there are some contentious points arising out of the definitions and otherwise on which it would have been illuminating to have had the opinions of those present at this discussion.

As the concluding words of this Paper were written the Local Government Bill of 1928 was published. This is a most comprehensive measure dealing principally with what is termed the "Reform of the Poor Law" and "De-rating"; and as I have had only two or three hours to glance at its 115 clauses and 12 schedules, I cannot do more than very briefly indicate the more interesting portions.

Excluding for the moment the rating and valuation portion, surveyors will be principally interested in Part III. of the Bill, which provides for the transfer to county councils of—

- (a) All highway powers of rural district councils;
- (b) All classified roads in urban districts and non-county boroughs.

Clauses 33 to 35 deal with town planning, and Clauses 42 to 45 concern themselves with the alteration of the boundaries of local authorities.

Part V. deals with rating and valuation, and gives effect to the "Budget Proposals for De-rating" by providing that on and after the 1st October, 1929—

- (i.) Agricultural land and buildings shall be wholly exempt from rates and shall be excluded from valuation lists coming into force after that date.
- (ii.) Industrial and freight transport hereditaments shall be rated on one-quarter only of what would otherwise have been their rateable value.

Some rating surveyors may have a pang at the passing of the old contentious question of farm cottages, for Clause 57 provides that houses and cottages occupied in connection with agricultural land by persons engaged thereon are to be assessed at their value as let for that purpose and not as ordinary dwelling-houses. It must be confessed that even yet it does not seem clear if, in the case of farm cottages, it is the value to the farmer or the labourer that is to be ascertained.

There are also provisions as to the borrowing powers of local authorities which are of interest.

In conclusion, I must apologise for the many imperfections this Paper exhibits. It has had, owing to the rush in which all who specialise in rating find themselves at the present time, to be prepared in a great hurry; but if, in spite of its faults it serves to elicit the views of those whose knowledge and experience far exceed that of the writer, it will not have been unfruitful.

A DISCUSSION took place on
THE RECENT RATING ACTS IN OPERATION.

Mr. C. B. FISHER, C.B.E. (President) in the Chair.

Mr. C. GERALD EVE (Member of Council), in proposing a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Fleury for the excellent Paper he had prepared, congratulated the author on the clever manner in which he had sorted out what might be termed the burning problems which were exercising the minds of surveyors who were engaged in rating at the present moment.

Time was limited, so he would at once plunge into the question of the rating of machinery. All were agreed with the author that electric motors, and the shafts which they drove, were outside rateability, and that any doubt on that point had been successfully removed. The author referred to the question of whether any part of any plant was in the nature of a building or structure, and referred to the Portsmouth case. He personally had been the official referee who had had to decide that case, and it might be interesting, therefore, if he mentioned what his opinion was as regards the words "building or structure" in regard to machinery. It was a difficult question, but there was one fairly common-sense working rule, namely, that first of all "building or structure" must be read together, and that if it was a kind of thing which would be assembled on the spot in parts and then built or constructed, then it was in the nature of a building or structure; but if normally the thing was ordered from a manufacturer, then, generally speaking, it was not a building or structure. To refine that statement somewhat, if a large Lancashire boiler was ordered from the manufacturer's, he did not think that could be called a building or structure; it was not built or constructed on the spot. A house was built by assembling the parts, getting them together, and building or constructing them. Anything, therefore, which normally would be purchased whole and brought and deposited on the site would not, in his view, be a building or structure. Therefore, as in the Portsmouth case, there were large and small old ships' tanks, old Lancashire boilers, brought from the docks and dumped down on to the appropriate brick or concrete setting, he had held in that case, rightly or wrongly, that none of those things was in the nature of a building or structure, but they were ordinary manufactured articles which were not assembled in parts on the spot and built or constructed on the spot.

The author mentioned the glasshouse case at Bedford, and said that it had been decided that glasshouses did not come within Part 1 of the Second Schedule. He did not think the author should go as far as that. What he should have said was that the hereditament, composed of glasshouses in that case, was held by the court not to require a gross value. The case was more or less sub judice, and he would say no more; but members were perfectly aware that no court could try any case without having the facts before it, and it did not follow that because the court, on the facts of that case, had held that it should have no gross that no glasshouses in any case whatever should have a gross. One must wait until one understood the case more.

The author set out Classes 1 to 5, "Houses and Buildings without land," and said the wording of those clauses was identical with the wording of the clauses in the 1869 Act. It was not quite identical, because the words "or either of them," appearing in Class 1 only of the 1869 Act, were not present in the 1925 Act. Time did not permit of him to indulge in prophecies as to what that exclusion meant.

The author then raised the burning and interesting question of whether the definition of net annual value only for a public utility undertaking transferred, and was meant to transfer, to the hypothetical tenant the burden of absolutely undertaking all statutable repairs. It was the rent reasonably expected if the tenant undertook to bear the cost of repairs. Therefore there was an undertaking to bear the cost of repairs. One side raised the argument that if that was so, the tenant, before he took on that public utility undertaking under a full repairing and renewing lease, would require not only to have the old tenant's capital, but also further capital, so that he might have cash in hand to do the landlord's repairs and to take over by valuation the landlord's repairing and renewing stores. His own view was that the taking of a percentage on the tenant's capital to arrive at the tenant's share, so as to arrive at the balance which was rateable value, was only a means to an end, which means should never be permitted to produce a wrong rent. The real rent for which the thing would let was to be found, and if any channel arrived at an absurd result, the sooner that channel was abandoned the better. It was clear that if the tenant's capital was going to be enlarged simply in order to arrive at a rateable value which was repugnant to one's common-sense, one had better abandon the channel and retain one's common-sense.

He had been rather horrified at the suggestion that in any case of a public utility undertaking the assessment committee should be cut out and the matter taken straight to Sessions, and that that should be the law. Personally he had a great regard for what he might call the horse sense of the assessment committee. They might not be experts in law or in rating, but, as judges said of juries, judges of the High Court would be sorry to try facts, and much preferred to leave them to the common-sense of citizens. Assessment committees frequently produced a remarkably sound answer to these very thorny points and questions. There was such a thing as an expert becoming so expert that he could not see the proper answer because his mind was warped by academic points. Personally he should be sorry to see the assessment committee cut out. It could always refer, if in difficulty, to a valuer, and why cut out that possibility?

He was going to be very angry with the author when he came to challenging the Central Valuation Committee on what they said about hospitals. Personally he said most decidedly that what the Central Valuation Committee had said was absolute law; it was no special pleading at all.

The Central Valuation Committee were trying to assist the rating authorities and assessment committees to arrive at the amount at which one would expect, say, a voluntary hospital reasonably to let for from year to year. Many people said "If you assess this hospital at this big figure "they cannot afford to pay the rates"; but that was only half the tale. If the rateable value on a hospital was assessed, they had not only to pay the rates, they had to pay also the rent on a repairing lease. That was what people forgot. One put on a rateable value of £1,000 a year. One thus said that hospital could afford to pay £1,000 a year, and rates at 15s. in the £ on the £1,000 a year. It was not the rates only if the assessment was right. And what was one rating? A voluntary hospital. It had to be let and used as a hospital. Who would rent that hospital, except the voluntary committee? Who else could be found. Could a voluntary committee be found to run that and use it as a hospital, paying the £1,000 a year and the rates on it? And the £1,000 a year rent must not be forgotten. Everything which the Central Valuation Committee had done in the matter was absolutely law. The suggestion that the Central Valuation Committee were putting up a rule of thumb was wrong. They were putting up a rule of law.

The author suggested that the true valuation appeared to be a "contractor's" theory value. To his own mind, if the Valuation Committee had put up the contractor's theory value as the method of arriving at the yearly or annual rent of a hospital that would have been a rule of thumb, and far more dangerous than the rule they had put up.

The author attacked the Central Valuation Committee on one point about coal mines. He did not think Mr. Fleury had gone into the matter carefully enough. What the Central Valuation Committee had said was "and that "the estimate of the output should be based on the average "of the annual output of the two previous years." If any surveyor to-day could say what the annual output of a colliery was going to be for the next few years, taking one year with another, he would be a remarkable prophet. The Central Valuation Committee said "You should make an estimate, and if you use as your estimate the output of the "two previous years, it is a good working rule." Everyone knew that the Central Valuation Committee were skating on thin law, but they did take great care to guard themselves over the law. They said "Make an estimate." They did not say "Assess on the last two years," but make an estimate, and then they said "Take good care that your estimate should be based on the two previous years." The author was attacking their law. Personally he did not think their law could be attacked. Their practice might be attacked. Was not that convenient practice, even if it was thin law? If any of the members were ratepayers of a mineral undertaking, would they rather the local rating authority made sixty guesses for each of the next sixty years as to what their output was going to be in the future? One party would lose—either the rating authority or the mineral occupier. But if one always exactly guessed what had happened in the last year, one got substantial justice between the two parties. That principle was much to be commended, and might he add that it was more to be commended if it had been the subject of agreement between the rating authority and the mineral occupier. That was the ideal, of course.

When one came to the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, he would like to say two things. One was that he rather regretted, although no doubt it had been found necessary, in the Apportionment Act of 1928, and in the Local Government Bill and in the Rating Act of 1925, to lay down two parallel lines meeting at a point on the 1st October, 1929. In the meantime from now until then it was necessary for ratepayers to watch, and attack if necessary, the deposited list under the 1925 Act. When the deposited list under the Apportionment Act of 1928 was deposited they must also watch that, and they must continue to watch both those lists, and to attack them at different times and for different reasons until the agony ended about the 1st October, 1929, when the figure in the 1928 list superseded the figure in the 1925 list; and he was quite sure that when those two lists met, in very few cases would the same figure meet at the same point. One figure would be bigger than the other, and it seemed a great waste of ratepayers' money to have to attack two lots of lists until the one killed the other. No doubt it was necessary, but if it could have been avoided it would have been better. He would like to warn the members that when two lists existed, the 1925 deposited list and the 1928 deposited list, they might be sued for negligence if they did not see that their client watched both. If only one alone was watched, it might be found that the client's interests had been jeopardised. There was one other matter. Most of the members were now engaged in making those apportionments under the Apportionment Act of 1928—the non-industrial and the industrial portions. For what his opinion was worth, his theory was as follows: As regarded, first of all, offices, only that part of the offices, if any, which was not used in the management of the factory was non-industrial. All offices which were engaged in the management of a factory were industrial. Those engaged solely in selling products and for meeting places for commercial travellers, and for the entertainment of customers, and so forth, were not used for the purposes of a factory. All canteens, recreation-rooms, bicycle-sheds for the employees, and so on, were all part of a factory and entitled to industrial relief.

In closing, again he wished to say how much the members appreciated the efforts of the author in bringing forward those burning points before them, and in making a list of the salient points which were of such interest to surveyors.

Mr. A. J. BRICKWELL, C.B.E. (Member of Council), said he was glad to have the opportunity of seconding the vote of thanks to Mr. Fleury for his very instructive Paper. Many hours must have been given to its preparation. Mr. Eve had congratulated Mr. Fleury on picking out the salient points of interest to surveyors, and members would forgive him if, after Mr. Eve had fastened on to those salient points, he again referred to them in passing, because the matter appeared to him much in the same light as it had done to Mr. Eve.

Taking first the Machinery and Valuation Rating Order of 1927, he congratulated Mr. Eve on having been the first arbitrator under the Act to have decided which was machinery and which was hereditament. Personally he took the broad English view that Parliament had intended that the industry of this country, so far as its machinery was concerned, should be free from rating, and he appealed to surveyors not to raise cavilling matters on the question of what was machinery and what was hereditament, but to take the broad-minded view that Parliament had intended to relieve industry.

Then as regarded the hereditaments to which, in future, no gross need be inserted in the valuation list, such as the hereditaments comprised in railways, gas works, and similar properties, he had always understood that the cost of keeping the hereditament in a state to command rent was a legitimate expense which might be charged against the expenses of the business, or later to be deducted as what was known as the "statutable deduction."

With regard to Section 23, he ventured to disagree with the author. Parliament had made it easier for anyone letting a composite hereditament by permitting the assessment to be split up, so that if the unfortunate landlord had a part of his premises not let, he could at least obtain remission from paying rates on that portion, which, as the law stood to-day, it was impossible to do.

With regard to Section 37—the knotty point as to whether an assessment committee might, in their powers to revise an assessment, raise it as well as reduce it—in the presence of Mr. Konstam he hesitated to express an opinion, but in his humble judgment as an ordinary surveyor revision would seem to cover the whole ground and would permit the assessment committee to increase the assessment as well as to reduce it.

On the question of sporting rights, those, as most of the members knew, where not severed from the hereditament need not be shown separately from the land. Inasmuch as under the Local Government Bill, which was now before Parliament, all agricultural land would now be struck out of the rate-book, it did seem to him to be necessary, as the valuation committee had advised, that a separate figure should be put in the rate-book for that portion of the value which was ascribed to the sporting value.

The author had criticised the Central Valuation Committee because they had not sought statutory powers to co-ordinate decisions of Quarter Sessions. He thought Mr. Fleury had overlooked the fact that in the Rating and Valuation Bill of 1928, under Section 4, there appeared a clause which to most surveyors seemed objectionable. It read: "If on the representation of the Central Valuation Committee it is made to appear to the Minister of Health that a substantial question of law has arisen in relation to the valuation of hereditaments or of any class of hereditaments for the purposes of rating, and that, unless that question is authoritatively determined, want of uniformity or inequality in valuation may result, the Minister may submit the question to the High Court for its opinion thereon, and the High Court, after hearing such parties as it thinks proper, shall give its opinion on the question." That clause met with considerable opposition in the House of Lords, he believed, largely on the advice of the judges of the High Court, and was deleted from the Bill.

Coming to the Central Valuation Committee, he thought the author had been a little hard on them. After all, they were possibly like the gentleman who was playing the piano, perhaps not as well as they would wish, but was doing his best. If the list of the Committee was looked at it would be seen that it was a long one, containing the names of very able men who were engaged in local government work many voluntarily from a pure sense of duty. If the panel of experts was looked at, it would be seen that it was composed of members of the legal profession, mining engineers, and also many eminent members of The Surveyors' Institution. If one considered the matter for a moment, one must come to the conclusion from the constitution of that Committee and that panel that they could not have arrived at their decisions, even if one disagreed with them, except with the common idea of doing their best for the valuation of the country. Uniformity was the keynote of what the Committee were trying to arrive at. Uniformity to most people meant the death of character, and the death of individuality, but if the Valuation Committee could arrive at a basis of uniformity without that similarity to a row of peas in a pod which Englishmen so much abhorred, and if they could erase those striking anomalies—an instance of which was given in the Paper, where in one county the hospitals were rated at 7s. 6d. a bed as compared with £3 per bed in another—they would have earned the grateful thanks of their country.

Mr. E. M. KONSTAM, K.C. (Associate), desired to add his tribute of respect and admiration to what had already been said about the Paper, which showed a very careful study of the Acts, and a very considerable appreciation of the problems which arose under them.

He had only two criticisms which he wanted to make; they were both on matters of law. The author said that the rating of mines was not to be upon the past output, but the basis of assessment was the output for the ensuing year. He did not think that was quite accurate. What had been said in the Tanfield case had been "You must not be rigidly guided by the output in the past year. What you have to look for is the rent which the hypothetical tenant may be expected to give for the ensuing year." That did not necessarily involve making an estimate of what the output was going to be. All the hypothetical tenant could do was to see what the output had been in past years, and to form therefrom his estimate of the rent he could give for the ensuing year. It might be a rent which bore a royalty relation to the actual output of the last year or of some past year, and that, of course, was the usual way of arriving at it. On the other hand, it might be a rent which, in view of exceptional conditions, such as strikes, and so on, might have no relation, or only a very indefinite relation, with output at all. Really the Tanfield case was a decision which arose on the circumstances of what were, it was to be hoped, peculiar and exceptional years. It did not follow that the best "rule of thumb" which could be adopted might not still, in the majority of cases, be the output of the past year.

The other point was on the vexed question of the schedule which contained the list of classes of land and buildings—a list of the greatest possible importance in the working of the Act, and a schedule on which, he was sure, there would have to be some far-reaching decisions of the Courts. He felt equally sure that those decisions would be based not so much on a meticulous reading of the precise wording of the schedules as upon a common-sense interpretation of their intention. Unless the Courts took a broad view of the construction of that schedule, there might be a disaster, and therefore he thought one might be fairly certain that the common-sense of the Courts would be brought to bear upon it.

The criticism which he had been going to make was as follows: The author of the Paper said: "The conclusion "can be drawn that as one set of words can have only one "meaning." Anybody who had devoted any time to the reading of the income tax would come to the conclusion that one set of words might have a wholly different meaning in two different lines, and, not only that, but different words which one would expect to have a different meaning might be used with precisely the same meaning in two or three following sentences. He was afraid that much as his friend on the right had done to improve the legislation on the particular subject under review, our legislation as a whole could not be said to be drawn on the principle of always using the same word in the same sense, and of never using different words which had the same meaning.

There was another observation in the Paper to which he desired to refer, and which struck him as being a very weighty one, namely, that there was unfortunately nothing in the new Acts enabling the valuation of the various parts of a public utility undertaking to be correlated if those parts were in the jurisdiction of different assessment areas and of different Quarter Sessions. It was rather an unfortunate gap in our legislation which required to be filled up. He was not saying that it would have been practicable to do so in the 1925 Act. That might or might not have been the case, but it did require to be filled up at some later stage. They had it now reaffirmed by the House of Lords in the Kingston case that the sum of the valuation of the parochial parts of, say, a waterworks undertaking must not exceed the value arrived at by a valuation of the whole; but it was really an important and essential point, that there was no tribunal which could ensure that that was done where a waterworks undertaking extended into several areas. He thought it was likely that the Metropolitan Water Board itself, whose business was very ably managed, had succeeded in getting the aggregate of the parts of the undertaking to something even below the figure produced by a single valuation of the whole; but it must have taken a great deal of management to have done so, for even in regard to that undertaking, because it extended into London and various home counties, there was, in law, no tribunal which could see that the rule was applied. All one could do was to go in each particular area or county, and say "If you make the value of this part "higher, or as high as the assessment committee have "made it, we shall be rated above the valuation of the "whole"; but one had to do that separately by bringing an objection and an appeal in each area, and, if necessary, getting a case stated by each Quarter Sessions and asking the permission of the High Court to have all those cases heard together, so that they might be seised of the whole matter at one time. That had been the best advice he had been able to give in a recent case, and he did not think he could have given any other. The clumsiness of that procedure was out of date in the twentieth century, and called for serious consideration.

There were one or two caveats which he wanted to enter in regard to the working of those Acts of 1925 and 1928. Mr. Eve had drawn attention to the two parallel lines, which were not so parallel but that they must meet on the 1st October, 1929, and had pointed out that both lines required watching all along by the ratepayers and by the people interested, with which he himself entirely agreed. The proposal procedure under Section 37 of the Act of 1928, and the procedure for special list under the schedule to the Act of 1928, were both drawn with great ingenuity and ability; and there also would come in a procedure, he supposed, for adjustments to the valuation list in force in the new Bill which was now before Parliament. But no man could foresee everything, and there was not enough Parliamentary time to provide clearly for everything when a general revolution was being made in procedure. To his mind there might come a fearsome day when some counsel would have to expound to the Divisional Court all those various procedure provisions in different Acts, and would have to submit to the Court that they dovetailed together with that precision which their authors hoped for. It was not difficult to imagine that the three judges of that Court might require to be satisfied that such a precise dovetailing really did take effect. Personally he hoped that if he were engaged in that discussion he would be on the side which refuted the suggestion of absolute dovetailing, because then he thought his task would be easier. But those gloomy premonitions were perhaps for his own profession rather than for the surveying profession. He only mentioned them to emphasise the point that a great deal of care would have to be taken to follow out the provisions of procedure in each Act; and not to assume that all was for the best in the best of all possible worlds, and that if one made a proposal now one was sure to get all the relief that one wanted, and that one need not also take for that purpose all the measures which were enjoyed under the special list procedure.

His last point was as follows: The proposal procedure, as the members knew, covered the ground which was covered by the procedure for objection under Section 1 of the Act of 1864, but it covered a good deal more ground also. It covered the ground of supplemental valuation lists. It used wholly different language from Section 1 of the Act of 1864. It must not be concluded that because Section 1 of the Act of 1864 was gone, and because Section 37 took the place of it, therefore Section 37 was going to have precisely the same effect as the section of the Act of 1864. For instance, the proposal procedure was being looked upon as the "maid-of-all-work" of the Act of 1925, and everybody thought everything could be put off until the proposal came along. He was not sure that that was a foregone conclusion. He was not at all sure that a ratepayer could sit by and say "I am not going to have anything to do with this valuation list now, but I will wait until it is all in force and then make a proposal." He was not sure that the ratepayer would be a person aggrieved if he had kept up his sleeve material which he might have put before the assessment committee before they had finally approved the list. Still less, he was sure, could a rating authority lie by and say "We will just enter the same old figures we have had for 35 years or so. We can put it all right 'on the night' by a proposal after the list has come into force." He was not at all sure that such an authority after they had failed to make a valuation list, could say "We are a person 'aggrieved' by that valuation list which we ourselves have failed to make, and we demand to have it put right." That brought one to the ghost of Mr. Stirk, which had by no means been laid by the repeal of the Union Assessment Acts of 1862 and 1864. It was still the case that a rating authority were bound to make a valid valuation list, and in order to make a valid valuation list they must have made valuations of all the hereditaments which were included in the list. To that principle, at any rate, he pinned his faith.

Mr. DRYLAND HASLAM (Member of Council) said the author on page 63 invited opinions on the question of whether an assessment committee had power to increase assessments in certain circumstances. Mr. Brickwell had alluded to that point, and had said he thought they had power to do so. Personally he thought there was no doubt that they had power on a proposal to increase an assessment; but it did lead to a ridiculous and Gilbertian situation in many instances. Perhaps he could explain that more clearly by giving an actual illustration. The valuation list had been made in Reading last autumn, had been confirmed by the assessment committee in January, and had become absolute in April. A large shop had been erected during the summer, and had had to come into rating. The rating authority could only bring it into the valuation list, it being a new property, by making a proposal. They had consulted Messrs. Eve & Sons, who had advised that a proposal should be made for a sum of £1,444. The occupiers and owners of the shop, thinking the matter had been gone into so closely, even to the odd £4, had decided that probably it was hardly worth while to make an objection, although they had thought it rather high. When the proposal had come before the assessment committee, the only opinion of value had been that of Mr. Eve, that the gross value was £1,444. The other people had not been represented. The assessment committee, however, had said in effect "We think this is a ridiculous figure," and raised the gross from £1,444 to £2,000. The owners had been furious and wanted immediately to go to Quarter Sessions, and they had consulted him on the matter; but as they had not been before the assessment committee, they had no ground for going to Quarter Sessions. Therefore they had given notice that they would appear before them again, and the matter had been going to be heard last Friday, but on Thursday afternoon they had telephoned to say that the chairman thought that perhaps it was now time for them to be professionally represented, and would he have any objection to its being postponed for a week in order that they might consult their surveyor on the matter. The ridiculous position was that next Friday, when the case was heard, the assessment committee would be in the situation that it was their assessment of £2,000 which he was appealing against, and they would be in the position of judge and prisoner at the bar. It was their assessment which was being appealed against, and nobody else's, as the rating authority's assessment had been made at a much lower figure. There was the further ridiculous position that, supposing they stood to their guns and went to Quarter Sessions, the only people who could pay the piper would be the rating authority, because the assessment committee had no funds except what they could get from the rating authority; and although the rating authority had put in a much lower figure, and Mr. Eve was of opinion that his assessment was correct and therefore would not want to go to appeal, and it would be against their wishes that an appeal should be taken, they would be bound to pay the expenses of it if they lost. Everyone would agree that no committee or no man could be a judge of his own case. Therefore when an assessment committee took an action such as he had outlined, he thought he was right in saying that the position was ridiculous and Gilbertian.

Mr. G. V. NYE (Fellow) said he had great pleasure in adding his thanks to Mr. Fleury for his excellent Paper. He could unhesitatingly say that it was one of the most able Papers which he had read for a long time.

Turning to page 61, on which Mr. Fleury dealt with Section 23 of the Act, he was afraid he could not agree with the author's view that that section was intended to provide that a rating authority was entitled to value a house occupied in parts higher than a similar house adjoining and occupied by one tenant. He suggested that the last few words of the section, which read "and a building "so treated shall be deemed to be a single hereditament in "the occupation of a person who receives the rents payable "in respect of the parts," were meant to show who was to be rated—and that was the person in receipt of the rents—and were not meant to indicate that the person rated must be assessed differently from his neighbour who occupied the house in one occupation. He suggested that the point which had to be found in rating every property was the annual value of the property to the existing or to any hypothetical tenant. He could not hold the view that two properties identical in all respects should be assessed differently.

The author invited discussion upon the very important point as to whether the assessment committee had power, on determining a proposal, to increase the assessment. He was inclined to agree with the author and with

Mr. Brickwell that the assessment committee might increase an assessment on objection or proposal. By the Fourth Schedule of the Act, Part III., paragraph 10, the assessment committee need not hear all the objections before the final approval of the draft valuation list, and if, therefore, the assessment committee, through lack of time, treated objections as proposals, he could not think they should lose their right to adjust an assessment up or down, as they could have done before the approval of the list. Moreover, as such objections were to rank as proposals, and proposals were to be heard as if they were objections to the draft list, he thought the committee had power to increase.

The author on page 66 dealt with the question of hospitals. Like Mr. Gerald Eve, he failed to agree with Mr. Fleury when he suggested that the Central Valuation Committee were acting contrary to law in their representations. He did think, however, that the Central Valuation Committee had not gone quite far enough in so much as they said that in valuing all voluntary hospitals regard must be had to the present occupiers as possible tenants only so long as they were able to rely upon voluntary contributions. In his view where there was another possible tenant of a hospital—for example, the local authority—the hospital should be valued in accordance with the Act at its full value to the hypothetical tenant; but where the tenant of the hospital was the only tenant available, in that case he considered that the Central Valuation Committee was right. The question was: What rent would a tenant give for the property, he (the tenant) paying the rates? Therein lay the question of the ability to pay, and each hospital should be valued on its own merits. Generally speaking, a hospital could not afford to pay the rent, based on the contractor's principle, plus rates assessed on that rent.

His last point was one which was perhaps a little outside the Paper; it was with reference to the valuation of flats. The members knew the usual practice of valuing a block of flats—arriving at the gross rent, deducting the tenant's working expenses, and so arriving at the gross value, which was apportioned amongst the flats according to their respective value. A deduction for repairs was then made. As they were valuing each single flat as a rateable hereditament, presumably the scale deduction for repairs would be for repairs of the flat alone—that was, that hereditament, and consequently the repairs on the main hall, lift, stairs, &c., would not be a statutory deduction at all, but would figure as one of the landlord's expenses to be deducted before the gross value of the block of flats as a whole was ascertained.

Mr. A. B. THORNTON (Fellow) said he took it that the Paper was intended to open a wide discussion on the "horrible" subject of rating and de-rating. He therefore hoped he was excused for drawing the attention of fellow-members to some of the economic aspects of de-rating, as he thought it was a view-point which was going to affect them very much in their professional duties. From the Memorandum which had been published concerning the new De-rating Bill he saw that the estimated total loss on account of rates which the Exchequer would have to make good was the sum of 24 million pounds a year. It was anticipated that that sum would be fixed for all time, and it was to be partly provided for by the petrol tax which had been proposed.

The idea underlying the de-rating scheme had been the relief of depressed industries, but, rightly or wrongly, apparently all productive manufacturing industry was to be relieved. As far as he could understand, the prosperous industries in this country at the present time were really the luxury trades. If one took the tobacco factories, breweries, distilleries, gramophone factories, the artificial silk and sweetmeat trades, he thought one had covered some of the most prosperous forms of manufacturing industry to-day, yet he understood all those industries were to receive a 75 per cent. benefit from de-rating. Certainly there were depressed industries which would, no doubt, receive a well-merited relief; but one felt doubtful as to how much of the 24 millions per annum would eventually reach the source for which it was originally intended. It would, at any rate, create big differences in property values in certain cases, because it was impossible to transfer such a sum as that indicated without affecting values. There was also the doubt whether the petrol tax would ever meet the big deficiency which had to be made up by the Exchequer. If it did not, it would have to be made up in another form by the individual ratepayer or taxpayer of the country; and although the Minister of Health had given guarantees to all the big rating authorities in the country, personally he thought only time could show whether many individuals would not later be involved in higher rates and higher taxes in order to relieve prosperous industries which could very well afford to pay the rates to which they were now assessed.

There was another point, too, which seemed of importance. In the past, ability to pay had always been one of the maxims in our rating and taxation system; but apparently that principle had been considerably departed from under the new de-rating proposals.

There was also a matter which had given him some concern; that was in regard to the relief of rates on agricultural property. In many counties the farming community had an important voice on the county councils and other local bodies. They had gained that position because they had taken a keen interest in the rates they had had to pay on their property, and they had been a strong element for economy on the spending public authorities. In the future, however, the following position, which had never before arisen, would occur, i.e., those gentlemen would be sitting on councils and on spending committees, disbursing the general public's money, but they would be relieved of practically all rates themselves. It seemed to him that there would be no curb on them to keep down expenditure in the future such as there had been in the past. He thought that was a position which had not yet been sufficiently recognised by the movers and opposers of the new reform in local government which was now before Parliament.

There was one concluding point which he had touched on before, and while it was really a matter of public administration, it did closely affect members of the profession. He should like to think that every member of The Institution would do his best to get the anomaly of the dual valuation for (1) rating purposes and (2) for imperial taxation (Schedule A) abolished. It was creating an enormous amount of friction to-day with the public; and it was really of no advantage to the surveyor or the valuer. It was high time that our rating system was simplified to at least that extent. As Mr. Eve had mentioned, at the present time there were two lists in operation marching side by side. He believed next year, on the top of all the present chaos, another re-valuation for Schedule A fell to be made under the present statutory provision. That would still further irritate the public without any possible advantage. It seemed that many surveyors agreed that dual valuation should be abolished, and if they were united as members of The Institution in pressing for that reform, perhaps it would be attained.

Mr. C. HOWARD KING (Professional Associate, Special Rating Diploma) associated himself with the vote of thanks proposed and seconded to the author. The first point that had struck him on reading the Paper had been with regard to the assessment of buildings let out in parts. Mr. Fleury, in quoting from Mr. Konstam's book The Modern Law of Rating, said "The section does not apply to a house where 'the owner lives in part'"—Mr. Konstam must be quite right, but the point arose, that supposing there were a large three-storey house which was let out in floors, and the rating authority decided to assess it under Section 23, then, say the first floor became vacant, and the owner, instead of letting it again, decided to live in it, then he understood the rating authority must assess each floor separately, because the mere fact of the owner coming to live in the first floor did not turn those occupiers into lodgers, so that it could be said that the whole house was in the rateable occupation of the owner.

On the question as to whether Quarter Sessions was the best tribunal, many held the view that it was not. He would like to remind the members of the contents of the outline of the draft Bill prepared in 1926 by the London Boroughs Standing Joint Committee. That provided for a tribunal consisting of a lawyer as a paid chairman and two paid assessors appointed by the Lord Chancellor, which followed very closely on Mr. Fleury's suggestion.

There was another point concerning the Central Valuation Committee. In his opening remarks the author rightly pointed out that the Central Valuation Committee had no statutory power to enforce its opinions. At the same time he did not think the fact ought to be lost sight of, that at the first meeting of that Committee the Minister of Health had made the following remarks: "Parliament had been very cautious, and the Committee had no executive powers under the Act. It was contemplated, at first at any rate, that they should be an advisory body dependent upon good will and persuasion in conference to effect their purposes, but he reminded them that, as he had hinted to the House of Commons in moving the Third Reading of the Bill, their work and even their present form might ultimately develop upon more authoritative lines."

With regard to schools, the author sought for light as to what those other tests were. He (the speaker) took it that the Central Valuation Committee were in a difficulty. If they had mentioned the structural test as the true measure of rateable value, the Committee would probably have had Mr. Fleury and others quoting to them many decisions of the Courts, because the Courts had never decided that a structural test must be used to the exclusion of any others, and he took it they had used those words merely to protect themselves.

Then there was the point as to the necessity of a gross value in London. There was nothing in the 1928 Act which rendered gross value unnecessary, but he thought that was a great defect. The metropolitan rating authorities still remained under the difficulty of having to endeavour to value for gross and then to deduct for statutable in order to find the rateable value. The Third Schedule of the 1869

Act enacted a maximum of one-third for mills and manufactories. Now that machinery was de-rated, the deduction was probably, in many cases, too much, and although the deduction was a maximum, he feared it would continue to be treated as a fixed deduction. Rating surveyors generally valued for rateable, and then added to obtain the gross ; but if they ceased allowing the one-third deduction, there would probably be a crop of appeals consequent upon the appellant accepting the gross value and appealing against the rateable.

Mr. J. F. BOWDEN (Member of Council) said as a member of the Devon and Cornwall Branch he would like to be allowed to congratulate the author, who belonged to the same Branch, very heartily on the great ability which he had shown in the preparation of the Paper. He was sure that the success which had attended the author's Paper that evening would be regarded with pride and satisfaction by his fellow-members in Devonshire. He hoped that the efforts of the author would be an incentive to the other Junior Members of The Institution.

Mr. E. WITTON BOOTH (Fellow) also desired to add his quota of thanks to the reader of the Paper.

He rose to speak on one or two points connected with the valuation of public utility undertakings, one indeed touching on a matter which had been already well dealt with by Mr. Konstam. It must have been apparent to all those who had been engaged on that particular class of work during the recent valuation that there was, as the work was at present carried out, an enormous amount of duplication.

When an undertaking extending into more than one county and consequently under the present organisation of the work was usually dealt with by separate surveyors acting on behalf of each of such counties, or, it might be, for individual rating authorities therein into whose areas parts of the undertaking extended, it was clear that therein lay a duplication of work which did not lend itself to efficiency or to co-ordination in the final results.

Again, in many cases, such work was of little profit to the surveyor, and entailed on the undertakers the supply of duplicated particulars, and the conducting of separate negotiations, travelling over the same ground, which not only involved a waste of time and frequently delays to progress, but, in not a few instances, was somewhat vexatious to the undertakers.

It was well known that in the assessment of even a small part of the directly productive portion of any public utility undertaking a valuation of all the indirectly productive portions was essential, in order to arrive at the final deductions to be made for those in determining the rateable value of the total of the directly productive parts. Such valuations usually entailed an enormous amount of detailed work, and, further, demanded from the valuer a certain specialised knowledge and experience. One valuation of those when carefully made should hold good for every part of the undertaking wherever situated, and, further, in order to ensure co-ordination in the valuation of each of the several indirectly productive parts of the same undertaking for the same assessment it would be clear that the same valuer should act throughout.

Again, in the ascertainment of the rateable value of the undertaking as a whole it was equally important that that was a matter which should be left in the hands of one valuer, and, of course, preferably the same valuer who had dealt with the valuation of the indirectly productive portions. It was scarcely necessary to point out that in certain instances—indeed, in the majority of cases—the calculations involved in the determination of the proportion of the net receipts which were to be allotted as the tenants' share thereof, and the calculations of the equitable allowances to be made for statutable deductions, did call for a certain amount of specialised knowledge, and not only were those two factors the principal items of contention in valuations of that kind, but argumentum ad hominem they frequently differed in amount, and must therefore be finally arrived at, if agreed at all, by the application of reasonableness and common-sense between the parties.

As already indicated by Mr. Konstam, the legal position was clear, viz., that the rateable value of the undertaking as a whole should not be exceeded by the aggregate of its parts. Experience had shown, however, that it was indeed a rare occurrence for any two valuers, however experienced, working independently on an intricate valuation of that kind, to arrive at the same result, and that being so, should the greater or lesser amount so found be taken as that rateable value, which, by law, should not be exceeded by the aggregate of its parts?

Sometimes in practice conferences were held between the respective valuers interested on the one side, viz., that of the rating authorities, and, in that way, some agreement might be arrived at from their point of view. As to those, however, there were two things to be said, first, that, in practice, the exigences of the quinquennial period operated either against the holding of or the full representation at such conferences, and, secondly, that not unusually there was one or, may be, two of the valuers present who, having greater influence or larger experience in the particular matter, dominated the decisions, so that frequently it occurred that the valuation accepted in conference was really the valuation of one or, may be, two members of the conference, rather than that of the whole.

Again, the subsequent negotiations to try and effect a settlement were usually with a valuer acting for the undertakers, and in those it was obvious that such conferences were facilitated when occurring between two valuers only as against there being in conference two or more valuers on one side only.

When, however, settlements of the respective parochial parts were made by different negotiations with the valuers for those parts, almost invariably the final issue was not a rateable value for the undertaking as a whole represented by one amount, but by various amounts, notwithstanding that, in law, the aggregate of the parts shall not exceed in amount that of the whole.

The anomalies could be effectively remedied by an organisation which set apart the valuation of those particular kinds of hereditaments, and which took a broader outlook than county boundaries where those boundaries overlapped statutory areas of supply, or did not compass the whole of the indirectly productive works of the undertaking—in short, where the same valuer followed the undertaking wherever it was situated.

Time moved slowly to reforms of that kind. One could at least hope, however, that it moved exceedingly sure, in the conviction that when it came to fruition a considerable improvement in the organisation would be affected thereby.

There was another point in regard to which improvements would be a very great help to rating surveyors dealing with public utility undertakings, and that had reference to a more ready return than was experienced in many cases from the officials of those undertakings of essential information, such, for instance, as the parochial receipts, particulars required for the calculation of tenant's capital, and of indirectly productive parts which could not be taken on an inspection. The delays, often considerable in the supply of that information, seriously impeded the progress of the work, and any whip which could be effectively applied, and which would result in that information being more readily forthcoming, would be greatly appreciated.

It would appear that the necessary powers were contained in Section 40 of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, but those have not been put into operation in the demands for the requisite information from public utility undertakers.

Mr. W. RIDGWAY (Professional Associate) said that as a Junior Member he desired to add his thanks to the author, whose Paper he had read with great interest.

On page 54 there was a paragraph dealing with taking horses to the water. He suggested to the author that there were powers with county valuation committees to make the horse drink, and that if the rating authority had not done its work, then either the assessment committee would make it do its work or the county valuation committee would object as a body to the list being unfair as regards other parts of the county.

A good deal had been heard about the Central Valuation

Committee. That Committee's representations were merely expressions of opinion, and in several cases they were in conflict with the existing law. They might justify the existence of the Central Valuation Committee, but were apt to confuse the rating authorities.

Turning to hospitals, he did not agree that there should be sympathetic valuations for any class of property. If there was to be any sympathy shown at all, it should be shown in the poundage of the rates; the poundage should be reduced. In fact, in the Committee stage of the Apportionment Bill it had been proposed that hospitals should be included in the category of de-rated hereditaments. He suggested that if there were a flat rate for a hospital or a similar sort of institution they could not be so included. They varied so much in structure, accommodation, and position. He thought a structural basis, or a floor-space method, was a better way of dealing with them. It was, of course, far easier to count the beds than to measure up the area.

Turning to the Local Government Bill, in regard to agricultural hereditaments, the Bill was in its infant stage, and the members must have a little patience with it; but there was the question of the rating of farmhouses and farm cottages. What was the difference in value to the farmer of a cottage, and what was the difference to the labourer? He suggested that the basis of valuation for farm cottages should be different from the basis of valuation of farmhouses. A farmhouse was necessary to the land, and was in the occupation of the worker of the land. The farm cottage was merely for the occupation of the labourer after his work was done, and it served for him the same as the cottage occupied by the blacksmith in the village. In the Times of the 23rd November there was a letter from the chairman of the Land Union in which he said it was proposed to put forward an amendment during the Committee stage of the Bill which would secure a uniform valuation of all cottages occupied by men in agricultural operations or on work in connection with an agricultural estate. Personally he doubted whether that would be accepted; it was to be hoped that it would not.

Then, again, with regard to agricultural properties, there was the question of the division of the valuation between the land, the house, the cottages, and the buildings. The Central Valuation Committee in their recommendations suggested that that should be divided up by a fixed figure. But there, again, circumstances altered cases. One might come across a farm of 300 acres with a house which at one time had been two cottages and had been knocked into one for the use of the farmer. In another case one might come across a farm of 300 acres with a gentleman farmer's residence. What was one going to do? Take a fixed proportion? He suggested not.

Difficulties had now presented themselves to the rating authorities in the carrying out of the Act, but it must be remembered that they were laymen. It would probably have been better, in the first place, if the Act had been given another few years before it had been put into operation, and if the whole of the valuations had been put into the hands of professional men.

The PRESIDENT, in putting the vote of thanks, said he desired to add his personal congratulations to the author for his excellent Paper. It had been most useful to members of The Institution, not only to those who had attended that night, but to very many of The Institution's 7,000 members, who would have the opportunity of reading it, with the discussion, in the Journal.

He was sure the members were glad that Mr. Cross, the Assistant Secretary of the Ministry of Health, was present to have heard the Paper and the discussion. They all welcomed Mr. Cross to the meeting that night.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried with acclamation.

Mr. FRANCIS G. FLEURY, in reply, thanked the members for the exceedingly kind way in which they had received his Paper. It would have been noticed that in the discussion the various participants had dealt very frequently with the same subject. Therefore he would endeavour so far as he could to reply by subject instead of replying in turn to each speaker taking part in the discussion.

He first referred to Mr. Eve's opinion on the question of the interpretation of the words "building or structure" in the Plant and Machinery (Valuation for Rating) Order, 1927. Mr. Eve's remarks on that point, and also his remarks on the method of determining a "building or structure," would be extremely helpful to all the members, coming, as they did, from such an authority as Mr. Eve.

There was one point in regard to which he thought Mr. Eve must have slightly misread his Paper. Mr. Eve had pointed out that the wording of the definition under the 1869 Act of the classes of houses and buildings varied from that under the 1925 Act. That had not been exactly his point. His point had been that the definition in the First Schedule of the 1928 Act was "Houses and buildings without land other than gardens," and that was similar to the wording under the 1925 Act. Mr. Konstam had followed that up by saying that although the words "houses and buildings" were the same in the Act applying to London as in that applying to the provinces, they might mean one thing in London and something quite different in the provinces. He admitted that the same words might, under differing circumstances, have differing meanings. Even under the same circumstances the meaning sometimes differed. Humorists suggested that beer might mean one thing in London and quite another thing in the provinces. Personally, with the greatest respect to Mr. Konstam, he did not quite agree that those definitions could be treated as distinct, and it seemed to him that "houses and buildings" were the same in London as the provinces.

Mr. Eve had dealt with the question of hospitals, and had suggested that it was necessary in valuing a hospital to bear in mind that not only had the hospital to pay the rates on £1,000, assuming that that was the rateable value, but it had also to provide that £1,000 rent. Surely there was one point there, namely, that if those buildings were worth, on a structural value, £1,000, they must at the same time have cost, say, for the sake of argument, £20,000. If that hospital, instead of investing that money in those buildings, had invested the £20,000, they would have had a fund from which they could pay that £1,000 rent.

There was the further point which Mr. Nye had made, namely, the comparison with hospitals owned by local authorities, and although possibly that would not become an acute question, because local authorities were not likely to incur the odium of taking any action, it was an important consideration which should be borne in mind.

Mr. Eve further dealt with the question of the tenant's share in the valuation of public utility undertakings, and pointed out that that was only a channel to arrive at net annual value, and that any channel which produced an absurd result should be disregarded. While that might be sound common-sense, did it answer the legal query? He was doubtful about that.

On the suggestion that objections to the valuation of public utility undertakings. Mr. Eve said that he preferred to leave the matters to the horse sense of the assessment committee. That was an expression of opinion to which, coming from a surveyor with Mr. Eve's great experience, he gave great weight, but he thought that those members who had appeared frequently before assessment committees would have their own views upon the matter.

While dealing with the question of public utility undertakings, Mr. Booth had mentioned the matter of one undertaking being dealt with by one valuer. If his memory was right, there was a draft clause in the 1925 Bill to set up a body to deal with the valuation of railways, which body was also to deal with public utility undertakings extending over more than one area, and he believed that that proposal was not entirely dead. There was also the recommendation of the Central Valuation Committee on the matter.

Mr. Brickwell, in dealing with the suggestion about Quarter Sessions, pointed out that there had been a clause in the 1928 Act giving the Central Valuation Committee power to take the opinion of the High Court on a question of law, but the suggestion in the Paper was not so particularly applied to law as to fact. He had given an instance of the tenant's capital, and that was purely a question of fact, and therefore would not fall within the clause mentioned by Mr. Brickwell.

On coal mines. Mr. Eve's opinion that agreement between the parties as to the method of valuation did not do away with the charge that there would be lack of uniformity if only certain occupiers of coal mines agreed.

Mr. Howard King had referred to his remarks on the valuation of schools, and had suggested that the words "or "other test" were merely a safeguard. If they were merely a safeguard, it was perhaps a little dangerous to have expressed it in that way, and it would have been much better if the Central Valuation Committee had amplified the words further, and let the rating authorities understand more clearly what was intended.

Several speakers had dealt with Section 23, and Mr. Nye had raised the point as to a portion of a house becoming empty. He thought he had dealt with that in the concluding remarks of that part of his Paper where he had said that "In making a valuation of a house let in parts it must be "remembered that, if one assessment is made, rates will "have to be paid even if a part is vacant, and consideration "should be given to this."

The last speaker mentioned the point that certain rating authorities were simply inserting the old figures in the new valuation lists. He had been well aware, when he had written that, that the County Valuation Committee had power to take action, as also the assessment committee, but it was a little difficult to take action within the necessary time, because the valuation list for an area could not be made in five minutes, and to start the procedure sufficiently early it was difficult to get evidence that the list would not be ready in time. That largely nullified the effect of that section. Mr. Ridgway further referred to the percentages which were put forward by the Central Valuation Committee in their representations. He (the author) had been accused of saying a lot of hard things about the Central Valuation Committee, but he would like to say something on the other side, and that was that the Committee had taken great care to point out that those percentages were merely a guide, and not to be taken as a rule-of-thumb percentage at all.

While on the subject of the Central Valuation Committee, he would like to say that certain paragraphs of his Paper might be read as throwing doubt on the frankness and sincerity of that body. He would greatly regret to think that such an impression had been created, and took that opportunity of saying that it was very far from his wish or intention to introduce anything which might give ground for that view. He had meant merely to suggest that he was doubtful whether the Committee, in their representations on coal mines, had not amplified, rather than adopted, their experts' report. He had since learned that his doubts were entirely unfounded.

Mr. Ridgway had also said that he thought the farmhouse was necessary, but that the cottage was quite unnecessary. Personally he thought it must be obvious that it was necessary in a country district for a farmer to have his employee living on the farm.

Before concluding he would like to draw attention to Mr. Konstam's opinion that it was doubtful, where there was not a change of circumstances since the making of the draft list, if a proposal could be made when no objection had been made to the draft list. That, to him, seemed very important and worthy of great consideration.

He desired to express his personal thanks to the many members who had spoken, and whose remarks had been of great personal benefit to him and, he was sure, equally so to the others present.

The meeting then terminated.

The following written communication has been received from Mr. J. C. SPENSLEY (Fellow) :—

Mr. Konstam mentioned the lack of any co-ordinating authority to deal with hereditaments situated in more than one assessment area. The Rating and Valuation Bill as introduced recognised the difficulty and provided for the constitution of a railway assessment authority charged primarily with the duty of valuing railways, but with authority to agree to undertake the valuation of any special properties referred to it. The portion of the Bill concerned was, however, jettisoned in Committee. The question has since been revived so far as it affects railways, and the heads of a Bill for establishing a special Railway Assessment Authority for England and Wales has been agreed. When this authority has completed its heavy initial work, it would probably prove to be a suitable authority for dealing with other hereditaments running into several assessment areas.

A question which ought to be discussed by The Institution is the new principle of rating which has been enunciated in connection with the Local Government Bill. The Minister of Health, in his second reading speech, is reported as follows :—

“In the early days of rating . . . rates were levied upon what was the most obvious and visible sign of the ability of the ratepayer to pay, they were levied upon land and houses. But when the factory system came into existence you got a new kind of hereditament, the factory itself, and at once you got an anomaly, because the factory is not a measure of ability to pay at all.”

This is a theorem which has been overlooked by all the Royal Commissions and Select Committees which have considered the question of local taxation. As long as the Government's proposal was that industry should be benefited by the remission of rates at the expense of the petrol tax, no question of local taxation principle was involved; but if the proposal is to consider the aggregate remission of rates merely as a measure of the amount of an Exchequer grant to be distributed on the basis of a formula, a new theorem has emerged. It has no authority of the recognised type, but that does not necessarily mean that it is not true. Is it sound, or is it not? This is surely a question on which The Surveyors' Institution should express its opinion.

PAPER 517.

SOME NOTES ON THE CHARING CROSS BRIDGE PROBLEM.

*To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors'
Institution on Monday, 7th January, 1929,*

By A. Norman Garrard (Hon. Secretary).

The general interest taken in the various proposals for a bridge over the Thames at Charing Cross led the Council to decide that a Paper thereon should be prepared and presented at an Ordinary General Meeting of The Institution for discussion by members. The duty of doing this devolved upon the reader, who, however, must at once disclaim all credit for its authorship. Such work as has fallen to his share in its compilation has been that of looking through and assembling the notes received from other members, and in acting as editor.

The subject of a new bridge at Charing Cross, considered in its widest aspects, raises many important questions of special interest to the surveyor's profession. The subject has come much to the fore by reason of the Report of the Royal Commission on Cross-River Traffic appointed by the Government in 1926, whose Report was produced in the record time of four months. It is, perhaps, not an exaggeration to say that the main reason for the appointment of the Commission was the final attempt, by those who had protested against the possible destruction of Waterloo Bridge, to find some means whereby that bridge could be maintained in its present condition for all time.

Fortunately there exists a wealth of information on the subject, although the wells from which one may draw are in some cases obscure, such as the proceedings of Select Committees on bridges in the past, and on the various proposals in regard to Charing Cross Railway Bridge, and the legislation relating to the bridge and railway. More recently the Report of the Royal Commission on Cross-River Traffic and the Report of the Advisory Engineers to the Minister of Transport furnish much information as to the proposals under consideration.

Physical Conditions.

Perhaps in the first instance it would be well to consider the physical conditions of this part of London. An examination of any topographical map of London and the development of the streets shows that there is nothing special in the lay-out to indicate that a bridge at Charing Cross would form a link between two well-recognised ancient lines of communication on either bank of the river. Owing to the turn of the Thames about the site of Waterloo Bridge, the natural continuation of the lines of communication on the left bank of the river is parallel to the river, and not at right angles to it.

It should be remembered that at the time when the existing Blackfriars, Waterloo, and Westminster Bridges were constructed or re-constructed the Victoria Embankment had not been formed, and the Thames at Charing Cross came a considerable way from the present embankment wall towards the Strand. Generally speaking, the Strand was at a level sufficiently high to enable a bridge to be constructed without too severe a gradient, and to give adequate headway over the river. This was obvious at Waterloo Bridge, and that bridge, opened in 1817, was constructed from the Strand level. On the Lambeth side the levels are different, as the whole of the land on that side, in ancient days, was marsh land, and any approach must be built up and must start a substantial distance back from the bank of the river.

On the Westminster side building development has proceeded casually along the line of the ancient ways from practically prehistoric time, but on the Lambeth side conditions were somewhat different. On that side approaches to bridges were made by special authorities or by the Turnpike Trusts in the latter part of the 18th and the early part of the 19th century. Thus Blackfriars Bridge Road was constructed under an Act passed in 1769, the purpose being to connect the bridge with the road from Westminster Bridge to the Borough, which it meets at St. George's Circus. As regards Waterloo Road, the Waterloo Bridge Company had power to construct it; but on their failing to do so, it was constructed by the Surrey Trustees, thus connecting the approaches to the three bridges at St. George's Circus.

History.

The history of a Charing Cross Bridge may be regarded as falling into two parts, namely (i.) the provision of the present Charing Cross Bridge, and (ii.) proposals for its removal and the substitution of a new bridge.

The stretch of river now crossed by Charing Cross Bridge remained unprovided with any cross-river communication until 1845. On the one side was Westminster Bridge, constructed in 1750, and reconstructed in 1862, which was free from tolls. On the other side was Waterloo Bridge, opened in 1817, which, as a toll bridge, had naturally to be a substantial distance from the free Westminster Bridge.

In 1845 a bridge between these two was provided, but it was limited to a bridge for foot passengers, and was therefore comparatively inexpensive. Powers for this footbridge were obtained by a company called "The Hungerford and Lambeth Suspension Foot Bridge Company" in 1836, with further Acts in 1843 and 1845, the name by the latter Act being changed to "The Charing Cross Bridge Company." This bridge, which was 14 feet in width, was opened on 1st May, 1845.

Probably one object of this footbridge was to establish communication between the Lambeth side and Hungerford Market, situated at its northern end on the site of the present Charing Cross Station.

The Market Company were authorised to grant a right of way to the Bridge Company, and it was recited that the northern pier of the bridge was proposed to be a landing place for passengers instead of or in addition to the Market Company's wharf. This market had been re-established some years before, statutory powers having been obtained in 1830 by a company called "The Hungerford Market Company" for the re-establishment of a market for the sale of fish, poultry, and meat, and other articles of general consumption and use. The Act gave powers for the extension of wharves into the River Thames and the formation of a causeway for the landing and embarkation of passengers and goods, for which landing and embarkation tolls were authorised. It was the highest up-river market in London.

In 1854 the Select Committee on Metropolitan Bridges reported on the question of the additional bridges necessary as follows:—

"Upon the question as to whether additional bridges are required, your Committee have examined Mr. Bennoch, Mr. Tite, Mr. Page, Mr. McLean, and other competent witnesses. These witnesses agree in the necessity for providing further means of communication across the river.

The sites proposed by them are—

- 1st. Tower Hill, below London Bridge.
- 2dly. St. Paul's.
- 3dly. Charing Cross.
- 4thly. Horseferry Road.

Without entering into the comparative merits of these several propositions, your Committee are of opinion that the bridges opposite Charing Cross and St. Paul's will become speedily necessary, especially should the negotiation with the proprietors of the toll-paying bridges prove abortive."

It will be noted that neither of the two bridges which they thought would become speedily necessary has been constructed, whilst the other two, namely, Lambeth and Tower Bridges, were constructed many years ago. At that time, however, the tolls on bridges had not been abolished, Westminster Bridge had not been re-constructed, and a Charing Cross Railway Bridge had not then been projected.

Five years later statutory powers were obtained for the scheme which established the present Charing Cross Bridge in the Charing Cross Railway Act, 1859, by which a company was formed for making and maintaining the Charing Cross Railway from London Bridge to Charing Cross, to which was added, under powers obtained in 1861, a branch to Cannon Street.

Both the Hungerford Market and the Hungerford Footbridge were acquired by the new Railway Company. An agreement scheduled to the Hungerford Market and Charing Cross Bridge Act, 1860, was made between the Railway Company and the Bridge and Market Companies for the payment by the Railway Company in respect of loss of tolls, &c., of compensation amounting to £85,000 in the case of the Bridge Company and £55,000 in the case of the Market Company. The chains and other ironwork of the footbridge were sold for £5,000, and were utilised in the construction of the Clifton Suspension Bridge over the Avon.

Whilst the extension of the railway from London Bridge was responsible for the objectionable Charing Cross Bridge, it may be mentioned that it was also indirectly responsible for the present St. Thomas' Hospital. The old St. Thomas' Hospital was adjacent to Guy's Hospital, and the Railway Company obtained powers to acquire a portion of the garden of the Hospital for the railway viaduct. In the Act conferring powers upon the Company there was a special provision as to the construction of the viaduct across the corner of the Hospital property, and another limiting the speed of the trains over it to six miles an hour. Notwithstanding this, when the notice to treat for the portion of the property required was served upon the governors of the Hospital, they challenged in the Courts the right of the Company to take a part only, and claimed that by Section 92 of the Lands Clauses Acts the Company were compellable to take the whole. This point was carried into the House of Lords, when the governors succeeded in their contention, and the result is reflected in the preamble to the Railway Company's Act of 1863 as follows:—

“And whereas by reason of the Company having taken under the Act of 1859 a part of the Curtilage of Saint Thomas's Hospital near to London Bridge, they were required to take the whole of the Buildings and Curtilage of the Hospital, and eventually they did, and paid for the same Two hundred and ninety-six thousand Pounds, being the sum determined by Arbitration to be the Amount of the Purchase Money and Compensation payable by them for the same.”

This is an interesting example of some of the difficulties which, at any rate in those days, surrounded an application to Parliament by a public undertaking for compulsory powers. Modern practice has substantially altered the position, and Parliament frequently modifies the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts in favour of the schemes which commend themselves to it.

Having obtained from the Railway Company the sum of £296,000 in compensation, the Hospital governors then acquired from the Metropolitan Board of Works in 1869 the site provided by the completion of the Albert Embankment, and erected thereon the present St. Thomas' Hospital.

The Charing Cross Railway Bridge was opened in May, 1864. According to a Paper published in the “Proceedings of the Institution of Civil Engineers,” it cost about £180,000, so that if not ornamental in appearance it seems to have been economical in construction.

In 1882 powers for the widening of the railway and the bridge were obtained, the cost of the widening from Charing Cross Station to Belvedere Road being estimated at £120,752. The widenings appear to have been duly carried out. This left the bridge with five running lines instead of the three originally constructed, and two lines instead of one for sidings.

The public footway which forms part of the bridge has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. The Charing Cross Railway Company in its Act of 1859 was required to provide a thoroughfare or thoroughfares in substitution for the suspension footbridge, which it was given powers to acquire, and for the right of tolls for which it afterwards paid the Bridge Company £85,000. The old footbridge was 14 feet in width, and when the railway bridge was constructed, two footways, one on each side of the railway lines, of a width of 7 feet each, were provided. The one on the up-river side does not appear to have been made available for any considerable time, if at all, for the use of the public. In 1877 the footbridge was freed from tolls by the payment by the Metropolitan Board of Works of £98,540 to the Railway Company. The question of restoring to the public the full footbridge accommodation which they originally had was raised on the Company's Bill of 1882, but without success, and in the widening of the bridge under that Act the footway on the up-river side disappeared. The question was again raised by the London County Council on the Company's Bill of 1900, which sought powers for a further widening of the bridge, and a provision was inserted in the Act for the construction of a footbridge of a minimum width of 12 feet. As this widening was never carried out, the footbridge remains of its present inadequate width.

In regard to the question of the removal of the present Charing Cross Railway Bridge, the bridge has from the first been the subject of adverse comment from an æsthetic point of view, and no doubt many have entertained the hope that the day would come when it would cease to be a disfigurement to the fine reach of the Thames which it spans.

The first practical suggestion, however, to secure its removal does not appear to have been taken until 1901, when, as related in the Proceedings on the South Eastern and London Chatham and Dover Railways Bill, 1917, the Railway Company were approached on the subject.

The suggestion at that time is stated to have been that, before the Railway Company decided to carry out the expensive widening scheme sanctioned in the Company's Act of 1900, they should consider the alternative of taking the station to the Lambeth side of the river.

In 1903-4 further discussions are stated to have taken place, and these appear to have been terminated by a letter from the Clerk of the London County Council on 25th January, 1905 (quoted in the 1917 Proceedings), in which it was stated that "Having regard to the very large expense and to the attitude of the South Eastern Railway, there is no alternative but to advise the Council for the present not to give further consideration to the matter."

In December, 1905, came the collapse of the Charing Cross Station roof, though on this nothing in regard to the removal of the station appears to have taken place.

In 1911 the question was raised of the construction of a road bridge as a memorial to King Edward VII., whose death had taken place in 1910, a plea for such a memorial being made by Captain George S. C. Swinton in an article in the Nineteenth Century in January, 1911.

In 1916 the question of the continuance of the bridge was raised in an acute form. The Railway Company, by a Bill in that year, sought powers to carry out a plan of strengthening the bridge instead of widening it. An instruction moved in the House of Lords required that the Royal Institute of British Architects, the London Society, and others, should be heard before the Committee of that House on the Bill.

Sir Lionel Earle, the Right Hon. John Burns and Sir Aston Webb among the witnesses who gave evidence were in favour of no powers being granted which would interfere with the consideration of the proposals for the removal of the bridge.

The Bill was passed by the House of Lords, but on second reading in the House of Commons it was rejected, the opposition being on the ground that it prejudiced the question of the removal of the bridge.

Following this another plea was made by Captain Swinton in the Nineteenth Century for the construction of a road bridge at Charing Cross as a memorial, this time looking ahead, to the men who fell in the Great War.

In the following Session, 1917, the Railway Company again applied for the powers sought in 1916, subject to important qualifications to meet the views of the London County Council and other opponents, and in this form the Bill passed. The Company were given the powers for the strengthening of the bridge, but the Act provided that in the event of any public improvement being authorised within 15 years of the passing of the Act, necessitating the acquisition of the bridge or station, the Railway Company should not be entitled to make any claim for compensation in respect of the expenditure on strengthening or of any benefits resulting from the passing of the Act. The Act also prohibited the Company from executing any works for the purpose of enlarging or improving Charing Cross Station.

In 1926 the Royal Commission on Cross-River Traffic was appointed as a result of a memorial to the Prime Minister, urging "the need for further inquiry into the "whole problem of London traffic and bridges before the "fate of Waterloo Bridge is finally determined."

On 30th November, 1926, that is after probably one of the most rapid investigations on record, the Commission reported, recommending among other schemes the construction of a double-deck road and railway bridge at Charing Cross. As a result of this recommendation the Ministry of Transport instructed certain engineers to submit a report on the Royal Commission's scheme. In accordance therewith a report, dated 4th April, 1928, signed by Mr. Basil Mott and Sir George Humphreys, was submitted to the Minister of Transport. Following this report negotiations between the various bodies and departments concerned have been taking place, and there for the moment the matter stands.

Magnitude of the Proposal.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the case for a Charing Cross bridge, and of the alternative schemes that have been put forward, it will be well to obtain an idea of the magnitude of the proposals as indicated by estimates of cost. The estimate of the Royal Commission for the scheme which they recommended was £7,500,000, which with the general addition of 10 per cent. for contingencies which they made, would give a total of £8,250,000.

In the report of the advisory engineers to the Minister of Transport on the Royal Commission's scheme, the cost of that scheme with certain amendments which they recommended was estimated at £13,050,000. The cost of an alternative scheme by the engineers favoured was estimated at £10,770,000.

These figures represent the net cost after allowing for value of any surplus property, and include the loss on the rehousing of persons of the working class displaced by the demolition of houses for the scheme. From the figures of cost of the existing bridges given in the evidence submitted to the Royal Commission it would seem that that of the proposed bridge would be greater than that of all the Thames bridges and tunnels up to the present time. The adoption of a scheme of such magnitude therefore demands very careful consideration on the part of those responsible for its design and execution.

The proposal of the Royal Commission is that not more than three-fourths of the cost should be met by contributions from the Road Fund, the remainder being borne by the rates. Even on this basis the cost falling on the rates would be about twice the estimated total cost of a new Waterloo Bridge capable of taking six lines of traffic.

Consideration of Case for the Proposal.

It will be seen from the history of the proposal for a Charing Cross road bridge that it is urged first on æsthetic grounds as a means of removing what is regarded as an eyesore—the present railway bridge—and of providing a bridge worthy of the position in the river. It is hardly necessary to search for examples of strong views to which expression has been given as to the inartistic appearance of the Charing Cross Railway Bridge. The Rt. Hon. John Burns' reference to the structure in his evidence before the Select Committee on the South Eastern and London Chatham and Dover Railways Bill in 1916 as "that ugly red oxide behemoth “that sprawls from north to south” may be taken as forcibly expressing the feelings of many towards it.

In addition to the removal of the present structure there has been the suggestion of providing a bridge worthy, as was originally suggested, of being dedicated as a memorial to King Edward VII., and later as a memorial to the men who fell in the war. Without doubt such a memorial would add to the beautification of London.

The other consideration, that of traffic, has perhaps, in the mind of some, been a secondary consideration, though all recognise that a fine road bridge in this position would be a valuable additional means of cross-river communication.

A third consideration is that of the improvement of the Lambeth side of the river, which, it is suggested, would be assisted by the construction of a new bridge and its approaches on the Lambeth side. This, however, would depend to some extent on the character of the approaches.

The Royal Commission on Cross-River Traffic do not refer at any length to æsthetic considerations in regard to the bridge, but base their recommendations mainly on grounds of traffic. None of the public authorities primarily concerned with London bridges and traffic, however, gave evidence in support of its immediate construction.

The evidence of the London County Council dealt generally with the question of cross-river communication, including an account of action in the past, the schemes proposed by the Council and those under consideration, with full particulars of the cross-river traffic and its growth. Their view seems to have been that, with the construction of a new and widened Waterloo Bridge and a new Lambeth Bridge, the requirements for the time would be met, leaving the question of the eventual construction of a Charing Cross bridge open.

The representative of the Ministry of Transport, who is chairman of the London and Home Counties Traffic Advisory Committee, whilst placing a bridge at Charing Cross in his list of new river crossings suggested, did not definitely press for its immediate construction, mainly on the ground of the heavy expenditure involved.

The Metropolitan Police representatives included a Charing Cross bridge in their list of new bridges recommended, but gave no evidence in regard to the proposal.

The Commission state that "The evidence which has been submitted to us from numerous and influential sources in favour of a new roadway crossing the river at this point is of the strongest character." Doubtless this opinion was based upon evidence given by non-official bodies and individuals such as the Town Planning Institute, the London Cartage and Haulage Contractors' Association, the London General Omnibus Company, the Commercial Motor Users Association (Incorporated), and the Roads Improvement Association, Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, Captain Swinton, and others.

The Royal Commission do not specially refer to the possible traffic that would be carried by the bridge nor to the question whether the expenditure proposed would be justified by the amount of traffic that would be carried. On the latter point two estimates were submitted, one on behalf of the London County Council in which it was estimated that a Charing Cross bridge would, on the basis of the traffic in 1924, carry about 5,000 vehicles in 12 hours (8 a.m.—8 p.m.), and another on behalf of the Ministry of Transport in which it was estimated "that at least 9,000 vehicles per day should be expected during the early years of the life of the bridge."

These two estimates, which may be regarded in a measure as corroborative, would place the traffic of the new bridge at a comparatively moderate figure, equivalent about 15 years hence, when the construction of the bridge is completed, to rather less than the traffic of Waterloo Bridge at the present time.

Referring to Southwark Bridge, the Commission say that "the large sum of money spent on the reconstruction has done little to attract a sufficient number of vehicles to justify that expenditure." This bridge was stated in evidence to have been reconstructed partly on grounds of stability at a cost of £416,000; and from the statistics before the Commission the traffic would seem to have been doubled by the reconstruction, then amounting to over 6,000 vehicles in 12 hours. This cannot be lost sight of in comparing the Ministry of Transport's estimate, above referred to, of 9,000 vehicles for Charing Cross Bridge, and the relative cost of the two schemes.

Referring to Lambeth Bridge, the construction of which was supported by the various public authorities concerned, the Commission say "we do not wish to oppose the construction of this bridge." This bridge would be on the site of an existing bridge with a good approach from the Lambeth side, and reasonably good approaches, though capable of improvement, on the Westminster side; its cost, with the circus at the Westminster end, is put by the Commission at £1,340,000; it would span a reach of the Thames between Vauxhall Bridge and Westminster Bridge (1,700 yards) greater in length than that between Westminster and Waterloo (1,063 yards). The Report, however, states that "its usefulness, except as a partial relief to Westminster Bridge, would appear to be somewhat limited." This may seem to some as an understatement of the case, as its construction has been advocated on the grounds of the relief it would also afford to Vauxhall Bridge and as providing an alternative route between Westminster and the City.

The Question of the Removal of the Railway.

As the question of the future position of the railway terminus and the attitude of the Railway Company overshadows any scheme, it will perhaps be best to give consideration first to the question whether the railway terminus should be removed, and, if so, on what terms to the Railway Company.

Charing Cross Station, though not amongst the great railway termini of London, is an important terminus. From the time-table it appears that about 230 trains are run daily to it, and an equal number from it, carrying in both directions probably between 60,000 and 70,000 passengers, or the equivalent of the whole population of a large town. It is situated in a central position, and from the passengers' point of view the transport across the river is made cheaply as the same fares and season ticket rates are in the majority of cases charged to Charing Cross as to Waterloo Junction. If the terminus were moved to the other side the fares might not be reduced, though the great majority of the passengers would be deposited at a greater distance from their destination. On the other hand, in case of removal, there would be many facilities available enabling the passengers to complete their journey, namely, by the tube railways and the omnibus services over the new bridge.

The Royal Commission did not recommend the removal of Charing Cross Station, apparently on the ground of the prohibitive cost involved in the abolition of the railway. The estimate of the advisory engineers, however, for a scheme involving the transfer of the railway station to the Lambeth side is less than for a scheme which would leave the railway station on the Westminster side.

The attitude of the Railway Company towards the proposal for the removal of the terminus is a matter of great importance. To acquire for a public improvement an important railway terminus and the lines leading to it is an exceptional and perhaps unprecedented operation, and if the Railway Company concerned opposed the proposal it might be difficult to obtain compulsory powers, and expensive to put them into operation.

In 1904 the South Eastern and Chatham Railway Companies' Managing Committee were unwilling to co-operate in a scheme for transferring the terminus, and the matter, therefore, fell through for the time. Since then, however, the situation has been altered by the amalgamation of the Southern Railways into one group. This removes the possibility of competition between what were previously separate railways, and takes away from Charing Cross the advantages which its situation gave in case of competition. From the Railway Company's point of view there are important considerations which will doubtless weigh with it in considering the removal of its terminus to the other side of the river. The present station is limited in extent, and by its Act of 1917 the Company is prohibited from extending it; the bridge will be expensive to widen, or to reconstruct; the platforms are only capable of taking trains of limited lengths, and the restricted area makes working slow and expensive, whilst the fact that in the majority of cases the same fares and season ticket rates are charged to Charing Cross as to Waterloo Junction indicates that a curtailment of the line would not necessarily result in a corresponding loss of net revenue. It seems from what is reported in the Press of the negotiations proceeding that the Railway Company is prepared to entertain the proposal that its Charing Cross terminus should be removed to the Lambeth side. The important question of the terms and conditions on which this should be done and the necessary property made available for the construction of a road bridge would remain to be settled. This is perhaps peculiarly a matter for the consideration of members of this Institution, but no information is available as to the terms, if any, which are under discussion.

It might, perhaps, be suggested that the question should be left to the operation of the ordinary law of compensation, in which case the public authority might contend that the compensation payable is the value of the property to the Railway Company for railway purposes and not for any other purpose. A criticism of this course of action would be that the matter is not an ordinary one but an extraordinary one; that whether the scheme of a Charing Cross bridge is or is not carried out depends on the cost; that in arriving at the cost it is necessary to know where the project stands as regards the railway, as otherwise too much is left in doubt, and that in a matter of this character the co-operation of a great Railway Company might reasonably be expected.

Schemes.

Probably in no scheme of bridge or street improvement has there been such a variety of proposals or such a divergence of opinion as that in regard to a Charing Cross bridge. This, perhaps, is not to be wondered at when it is considered that the estimated expenditure is on an unprecedented scale, that a great railway terminus is involved, and that the scheme is put forward perhaps primarily on æsthetic grounds, and consequently it is necessary to make sure that the result will be something more than a mere improvement of the present conditions.

The Royal Commission state that many schemes were brought before them, but plans of these are not included in the published Proceedings of the Commission, nor are they referred to at any length in the evidence. It will perhaps be convenient to begin with the scheme of the Commission itself. The germ of their scheme, they state, was provided by the main principles of Captain Swinton's scheme, which has been developed for them by Sir Owen Williams, K.B.E. The Commission's summary of the scheme is as follows :—

“(1) A double-decked steel bridge, with not more than five arches over the river, providing for six railway tracks on the lower, or present, level, with a 60-foot roadway above and two footways of 15 feet each, should be built immediately alongside the present railway bridge on its down-stream side, and that a new Charing Cross Station should simultaneously be constructed, on a site to be acquired which is bounded on the east by Buckingham Street. As soon as these become ready for use the railway tracks would be switched over to them, and the old bridge and station demolished, leaving the site of the latter free for the erection of a new hotel or any other development that might be desired.

(2) The roadway on the northern side of the bridge should cross over the Strand with a headroom of about 18 feet and, passing behind St. Martin's Church, reach the ground level in the vicinity of the Cavell statue.

(3) The roadway on the southern side should pass by Waterloo Station at platform level and opposite the main entrance. The new roadway from the bridge, on this side, would be built in part on the present railway viaduct (a new viaduct being simultaneously provided to maintain a railway connection with Waterloo Junction Station).

(4) At Waterloo Station the new road would branch by two inclined ways, 75 feet wide, down the centres of Oakley Street and Webber Street respectively (both of which would have to be widened to 150 feet), and would thus connect at two points with the proposed circular road designed to by-pass St. George's Circus and the Elephant and Castle."

This scheme is, it will be noted, for a double-decked, double-purpose bridge, road and railway, the former above the latter; it would be situated adjacent to the present bridge on the down-stream side, the centre line of the direct approach on the north being near the centre of Villiers Street, its length, with approaches, from the Cavell Memorial to the Blackfriars Road end of Webber Street or the Westminster Bridge Road end of Oakley Street being about 2,000 yards; it would pass on the north over the Strand as well as the Embankment, and on the south over Belvedere Road, York Road, Waterloo Road, New Cut, and Lower Marsh, with sloping viaducts along Webber Street and Oakley Street. From the æsthetic and property point of view it should be noted that this scheme would necessitate viaducts of about 2,000 yards in length. On the north the viaduct starting from the Cavell Memorial would cross Adelaide Street at a height of 18 feet, and then falling slightly would cross the river at a considerable height above the present Charing Cross Railway Bridge.

On the south side the extensive viaducts would involve the complete covering in of Waterloo Road north-west of New Cut and Lower Marsh for a distance of 900 feet, whilst there would be viaducts, gradually diminishing in height, in Webber Street and Oakley Street.

This scheme, as already stated, was referred by the Ministry of Transport to engineers, who, from their report, do not seem to be very favourable to it. They express the opinion that it does not present any insuperable engineering problems, and state that "if it is definitely decided that "Charing Cross Station is to be retained on the north side "of the Thames for all time, and if the double-decked "bridge will admit of æsthetic treatment in a manner "worthy of so exceptional a site, the scheme outlined by "the Royal Commission does present in principle a solution "of the problem."

They add some criticisms of the scheme and recommend that if it is carried out certain modifications should be introduced, the most important of which are :—

"(1) The bifurcation of the road approach on the north side of the river with one branch on each side of the station in order to give access to the Strand, and to allow of 28 feet head room over the whole station ;

(2) A deviation to avoid the long tunnel in Waterloo Road ;

(3) A branch to Waterloo Road between Waterloo Bridge and Stamford Street."

Moreover, their estimate of cost is £11,720,000, as compared with £7,500,000 estimated by the Commission, or with an addition of 10 per cent. for contingencies £8,250,000, whilst the modifications which they recommend would raise their estimate of the cost to £12,850,000.

The most important indication of the views of the advisory engineers is the fact that though, as they state, they were instructed to deal only with the scheme submitted to them, they put forward an alternative scheme for a road bridge only, the railway terminus to be transferred to a site at the present Waterloo Junction Station.

As already stated, the Commission were of opinion that the removal of the station was an unnecessary disturbance of existing railway facilities, but the advisory engineers do not seem to take this view. As regards cost, so far from the retention of the railway terminus on the north side being cheaper they find it would be dearer. It may be gathered, too, that on engineering and æsthetic grounds also they favour a road bridge, and consequently go rather outside their reference to submit a proposal for a bridge of that kind.

This road bridge scheme, in addition to the omission of the railway, differs from that of the Commission in introducing the modifications, such as a direct approach from the Strand and from Waterloo Road north of Stamford Street, and the omission of the covering over of Waterloo Road for a considerable distance. As a bridge with extensive viaducts at both ends, from the Cavell Memorial on the north to the Blackfriars Road end of Webber Street and to the Westminster Bridge Road end of Oakley Street on the south, it would, however, raise questions with regard to property, &c., very similar to those referred to in connection with the double-purpose bridge recommended by the Commission.

Both the scheme of the Commission and the alternative proposal of the advisory engineers are what may be described as "high-level" bridges, that is, bridges with approach viaducts over the Strand at one end and over Waterloo Road at the other. Other possibilities which have been suggested are a "middle-level" bridge like Waterloo Bridge, at its northern end starting from the Strand level and communicating with Waterloo Road and possibly also direct with Waterloo Station on the south, or a "low-level" bridge springing from the river banks without viaducts at either end, like all other bridges in London except Waterloo Bridge at its northern end. It is to be regretted that there are neither in the Proceedings of the Royal Commission nor in the report of the advisory engineers any plans of a "middle-level" (Strand level) bridge.

The advocates of such a bridge contend that it would have the advantage over a "high-level" bridge of shortening the length of the viaduct; and, as compared with a "low-level" bridge, of enabling a level, instead of a humped, bridge to be provided, which no doubt gives advantages in regard to design as well as enabling better facilities to be afforded for the river traffic.

Neither are there any plans or schemes in the published reports of a bridge springing immediately from the river banks. It was stated in evidence by the Chief Engineer of the London County Council that he started his consideration of the matter with a bridge of this kind, but came to the conclusion that a low-level bridge was a difficult thing to handle there, having regard to the properties all round and the amount of clearance that would have to be given to the river traffic. In the report of the advisory engineers they state: "We think it essential that level crossings for "road traffic both at the Embankment and the Strand "should be avoided; consequently any proposal to construct "a bridge taking off from the Embankment level, whether "raised or not, is inadmissible. The navigation channel of "the river at this site does not lie in mid-stream but near "to the Westminster shore on the concave side of the "quarter-circle bend in the river between Waterloo and "Westminster Bridges. A bridge, therefore, at Charing "Cross must have the necessary navigation clearances near "the Westminster shore."

Looking over the past records it appears that the bridge proposals which were before the Select Committee on Westminster Bridge in 1844 and 1846 and the Select Committee on Metropolitan Bridges in 1854 were for a low-level bridge with new street approaches. At that time Northumberland Avenue and the Embankment had not been constructed, and the proposed approach on the north was near the line of the present Northumberland Avenue, centreing on the Nelson Column. On the south there were various proposals for a new approach. One of the witnesses before the 1854 Select Committee put the case for such a bridge as follows:—

"By the formation of a bridge at Charing Cross with approaches from the Nelson Column, Scotland Yard and Whitehall, and by a road branching into the Waterloo Bridge Road, an almost direct line of road would be obtained from Trafalgar Square to the Obelisk, and the line of road through Whitehall, Parliament Street and Bridge Street (Westminster and Lambeth) would be cleared of a traffic which, for want of a new bridge, is forced over Westminster Bridge, with great detriment and loss to the owners of carriages, and with danger to the public."

A bridge springing from the banks is the normal class of bridge, and should not be dismissed solely because it is considered undesirable that two streams of traffic should cross on the level. In such an important matter as this the whole effect must be explored, including the effect on property by the treatment of the approaches. On the north there exists an important line of approach in Northumberland Avenue, though a new approach from the Strand would be necessary. On the south it would be necessary to construct an entirely new approach. The whole effect of the various schemes on the districts on both sides of the river, from the point of view of values as well as æsthetic considerations, must be considered and compared.

What is referred to as the "high-level" bridge, starting from the Cavell statue in order to cross over the Strand, is designed to avoid the interruption of the flow of the east and west traffic. This method of dealing with street intersections was propounded by the Advisory Board of Engineers (of which the late Sir John Wolfe Barry was chairman) appointed by the Royal Commission on London Traffic, 1903-5, but it has not been found practicable to adopt it in any important London crossing, although traffic difficulties have been greatly accentuated in the meantime. Instead, there has been developed in the last few years the method of regulation of traffic on the "gyratory" or "roundabout" principle. This is a practical method of dealing with intersecting lines of traffic where adequate space exists or can be provided. Incidentally it is suggested as a feature in the advisory engineers' scheme in the Strand and also where the viaduct delivers traffic in Westminster Bridge Road. It is a matter for consideration whether the suggested "high-level" viaducts afford the best means of dealing with street intersections, taking all circumstances into consideration, and whether, having regard to the cost, an adequate system of "roundabouts" at street intersections is not a more satisfactory method of dealing with the problem. It is interesting to note that, judging from public reports, the Ministry of Transport has stipulated that its contribution to the new Lambeth Bridge is to be dependent upon the formation of a circus near the Westminster end of the bridge, where the traffic from the bridge would cross the traffic passing along Millbank and Grosvenor Road.

The elimination on both sides of the river of high-level viaducts would no doubt remove difficulties in the way of the development of sites available for the erection of new buildings in the immediate vicinity of the bridge and its approaches. The advisory engineers' scheme shows an approach starting on the level by the Cavell statue, gradually rising to its maximum height where it crosses the Strand, and then proceeding at a slightly downward gradient to the level of the bridge near its start from the Embankment. Immediately to the west of this viaduct is a road which would pass on a falling gradient from the present Strand level to that of the Embankment; and, again, a short distance further to the west, another new road, practically level of the same width as the other, proceeding from the Strand to meet the other at the point of bifurcation near the bridge. Owing to the different levels of the roads, the plots lying between them considered as building sites, would be difficult to develop.

With regard to the viaducts themselves, they are not shown in the scheme as being designed to give facilities for the erection of any buildings having frontages to the proposed roadways, and although, in some instances, at the present level, they may be so treated as to provide accommodation for business premises of a kind, they would probably, generally speaking, as in the case of a railway viaduct, give rise to difficulty in the development of the district.

Considered from an estate development and management point of view only, which is essentially a matter with which we as an Institution are concerned, it would appear that this method of providing highways should not be adopted unless circumstances render it essential, and there is no practicable alternative. An endeavour has been made merely to place facts before you, and not to offer any personal opinion on the various schemes. The advocates of each will have an opportunity of giving reasons for their preference in the discussion which it is hoped these notes will provoke.

While it is not the function of The Institution to propound a solution to the general problem involved, and while, in the absence of full information necessary for the purpose, it is hardly possible to express any definite opinion on the subject, it would, perhaps, be useful to those on whom the duty and responsibility fall, that we should have had an opportunity of expressing our views on such points as are peculiarly our own. The proposal is one of unprecedented magnitude and of exceptional importance as affecting road, rail, and river traffic, involving both æsthetic considerations and results which must affect property values. The solution must be derived from the balancing of a number of considerations, some of which may appear at present irreconcilable, but the difficulties surrounding the problem would seem to make it the more important that we, as surveyors, should bring our knowledge and experience to bear in order to assist the responsible authorities in arriving at a satisfactory decision with regard to some, at any rate, of the elements of the problem involved in the proposals put forward for a Charing Cross Bridge.

ELECTION OF HONORARY MEMBER.

The SECRETARY announced that Mr. Eustace Hills, who had been for so long an Associate Member of The Institution, and who had undertaken the very responsible duties of examiner for some years, had recently been promoted to the honourable position of County Court Judge. The Council had therefore proposed Mr. Eustace Hills to the members for election as an Honorary Member of The Institution.

This was agreed to unanimously by the members.

A DISCUSSION took place on,

SOME NOTES ON THE CHARING CROSS BRIDGE PROBLEM.

Mr. C. B. FISHER, C.B.E. (President), in the Chair.

Mr. H. J. LEANING (Fellow) said he considered it a great honour and privilege to be allowed to propose a vote of thanks to Mr. Garrard for his admirable Paper. It was a very great achievement on Mr. Garrard's part to have been able to marshal all the facts in such a wonderful way as he had done, and at the same time to have exercised the extreme restraint that he must have exercised in not expressing any opinions with regard to those facts as he had stated them.

Mr. Garrard had given the members a very interesting story of how the present situation had been arrived at, but he had left out what he (Mr. Leaning) considered to be rather an important fact. The London Society in 1917 had put up a very gallant fight with regard to Charing Cross Bridge; he considered that it was entirely due to that fight that the members of The Surveyors' Institution were there that night talking about the matter at all, otherwise the Southern Railway Company would have spent £175,000 on the bridge, which would have been strengthened so as to hold four trains instead of two, and all chances of its removal would then have been lost. The Railway Company had promoted their Bill, which had been opposed by the London County Council and by the London Society. The former had been approached and had been asked whether they would agree to withdraw their opposition provided a clause was inserted which would have the effect of nullifying the amount to be expended on the bridge if any public improvement ever took place. To that the London County Council had agreed, and the Railway Company then made the same proposal to the London Society, who declined to consider it. The tenacity of the London Society had been very largely due to its president, Sir Aston Webb, who was convinced that if that money were ever spent the bridge would never come down. Therefore the London Society had fought the Railway Company in the House of Lords, and so emasculated the Bill, that the money never was spent. That had led to the present position, and had it not been for the subsequent energy of the Society in issuing their book London and the Future, their deputations and other activities in focusing public opinion, the Government would never have set up a Royal Commission to investigate the cross-river traffic problem. The appointment of that Commission by the Government had been a greater step towards the whole solution of the Charing Cross Bridge question than any of those connected with the London Society had ever hoped for.

What the members of the London Society mostly regretted to-day was the lateness of the proposed invitation to the architects to join in the conferences on the subject. Architects were to be allowed to join in the conferences "at the proper time." What that proper time was no one knew, but the London Society ventured to think that the architects ought to be called in before it was too late. He also thought that The Surveyors' Institution might, with propriety, have been consulted on the many matters which the bridge affected, and there were a great many of them, such as the whole question of the new values created by the scheme, recoupments, and so on, the extent of the compulsory powers to be given either to the Government or to the rating authority or to the owners of public land, the arrangements as to the closing of streets, and, last of all, that much vexed point of the betterment question. He did not know why it was, but the whole wisdom of the profession had never yet been able to devise a workable scheme of betterment. Here was a case where vast public funds were going to be spent, out of which somebody was going to derive very great benefit; and it did seem to him that some scheme ought to be devised by which the public could get back for itself a large proportion of those profits without allowing them to go into private hands. He did not think that was Socialism; he thought it was the right course. He had no doubt that many members of The Institution had been consulted about the details of the matter, but only in their official capacities.

Since the Road Board had come into existence and public money had been begun to be spent on London roads, there had been no scheme so large as the Charing Cross Bridge Scheme, the cost of which was to be provided out of public funds—out of a central fund; he did not mean a London fund, but out of a central fund, and that was a very great achievement. It marked the beginning of a new era. It seemed to mark the time when the public and the Government, and everybody, were beginning to recognise that London had its peculiar conditions, that it had to provide facilities and amenities practically for the whole world on a scale which vastly exceeded anything that any other city in the country had ever contemplated. They were beginning to understand that something had got to be done to provide a portion of that large expenditure from other sources; and he thought that was quite a good augury for the future of London development.

Turning to the difficult question of whether the bridge should be on the high level or the low level, the London Society had formed the "South Side Committee," of which the late Mr. Paul Waterhouse, who had built the Hall of The Surveyors' Institution, was chairman. That Committee had gone into all the questions involved in 1917, chiefly in connection with the development of the south side of the river.

During their deliberations the Committee had discussed among other things the bridge at Charing Cross, and all kinds of schemes had been brought before them, including high-level and low-level schemes. At the end of their deliberations a vote had been taken, and the result had been that 13 had voted in favour of the low-level scheme and 1 only in favour of the high-level scheme. That was an opinion which, he thought, ought to be taken into account. He could not conceive anybody seriously setting to work on a high-level scheme until the low-level scheme was proved to be absolutely impossible, because anybody who knew London well realised how it was covered with ugly viaducts, with blind, useless and wasteful cellerage underneath. More viaducts were not wanted if they could be possibly avoided; and failing proof that a low-level scheme was impracticable, he thought that was the alternative to be preferred.

Mr. Barclay Niven had worked out a scheme in which he had shown that, by raising the level of the Embankment opposite the end of Northumberland Avenue from 18 above datum to 24 above datum, it was quite possible to get a take-off which would enable the river traffic to pass and which would at the same time allow the trams, and so on, to pass underneath without meeting at the crossing. On the south side it was rather different because of the low level of the land, but Mr. Niven had worked it all out in such a way that he had proved it to be a practicable scheme.

There was one point about the question of a south side station. In the recent engineers' scheme, the best site of all, in his own opinion, was given up to the new railway station. He did not think any surveyor would ever recommend such a disposition. It meant giving up very valuable frontage to an unimportant purpose. The station could be just as well set back, and the Embankment front used for its proper purpose.

But when one came to look at the whole question of a south side station, one should remember a certain exploratory negotiation which had taken place about 1918, when an influential private committee had met the representatives of the Railway Company, who had then expressed their willingness to negotiate, but they had made an extraordinary stipulation, namely, that whatever money they received by way of compensation should not be allocated. That could only mean that it was not to be used for the building of a new station. At that time the Railway Company saw perfectly well that they did not want five terminals. Nor did they. With their small line they could do with one terminal. They had then seen the truth of the matter. Now they appeared to have altered their opinion, and wanted to maintain all five. It seemed quite ridiculous and quite unnecessary, and he thought the matter should be explored. It was a case for another Commission, as the whole of the London railways were in a somewhat chaotic condition. A general cohesive plan should be prepared and agreed as a basis for future development. Parliament had asked for it since 1863.

He congratulated Mr. Garrard on his great achievement in putting the facts together so fairly and judicially. He sincerely hoped that the discussion would lead to some tangible results.

Mr. CUTHBERT LAKE (Member of Council) desired to second the vote of thanks to Mr. Norman Garrard for his review of a problem which interested acutely and seriously not only London but the Empire. The Paper was an able expression of Mr. Garrard's shrewd but unbiased judgment, which could not fail to assist the authorities with whom a decision lay.

His own thoughts on the problem were limited by the knowledge gained in the course of his work and life as a valuation surveyor who had been born in London, had conducted for thirty years a general London practice, and whose work and other interests were general rather than specialised.

That the present Charing Cross Bridge was an obscene excrescence on the metropolis was so widely accepted that it need not have been stressed, and the need for a bridge for vehicular and pedestrian traffic in that position was generally realised. Such a bridge would ease the congestion on the existing bridges, and would not create of itself new centres of congestion, and would help to clear the Elephant and Castle blocks on the south. The congestion at the "Britannia" cross-roads in Camden Town on the north had to be dealt with in any case whether the Charing Cross Bridge was carried out or not, as must also that in Charing Cross Road.

The Charing Cross Bridge would be long and exposed, and greater protection for pedestrians against wind and weather would be given than was afforded by any of the existing bridges.

The cost sounded enormous, but ten millions raised on a 50-year $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. principal and interest repayment loan meant but $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.—£526,749, or half a million a year, and if one-quarter was found by the London County Council and three-quarters by the State, the burden would not be appreciable, provided the result was what might be expected.

Any disadvantage there might be in making the railway terminus on the south side of the river would be more than balanced by the convenience given to the travelling public in increased facilities for passenger distribution.

Finally he asked the members to look at the thing that was there now, and the conditions north and south, the blinker screened approach to Waterloo, and the fly-blown court of Charing Cross. Were they content to let that remain while London around was expressing its long hidden character and personality in its streets and building development of this century? And did those present not think that they as the valuers, the advisers, for the development of an estate which was not merely London but Great Britain and the Empire, must say that, although it might cost a lot of money, the improvement would pay, and pay handsomely even though those from overseas might not contribute much more than admiration.

There were also profits other than direct material profits which it would bring. While construction was in progress it would not hold up the work of London to any appreciable extent, nor would it impose any appreciable handicap beyond that now imposed by the present state of affairs. It would shift centres of value, and give the venturer in property an opportunity of making and losing money as would any new wide way. And they as valuers had to bear in mind not merely such precedents as the trade centres at Knightsbridge, Wood Green, Hammersmith, West Ham, Golders Green, and the like, but such cases as Holborn Viaduct, Rosebery Avenue, and further afield, as at Newcastle and Lausanne.

All his knowledge, sense and instinct impelled him to the conclusion that such a bridge would make London a better place, and the Londoner a better man by giving him inspiration to improve and develop profitably much of London which all would like to see developed and recreated. It would inspire, he was quite sure, the clearance of a good deal of slum property in South London, which it did not immediately touch, and would develop the square mile in a way which would bring both material and, he would almost say, spiritual advantage to the City of London.

The removal of Charing Cross Station was necessary, and the bridging of the Strand was necessary. The suggestion of a circus there was all very well if it was considered that the traffic would be no greater than the traffic which would be dealt with at the proposed Millbank Circus; but the traffic at Millbank was not to be compared with the traffic of the Strand, and the circus should be sufficient. He had heard the suggestion again and again of the low-level bridge. He saw the vast advantages of a low-level bridge in certain directions, but he had seen no scheme yet which provided for the distribution of traffic at a low level in a way which they, as surveyors, could accept as feasible.

Sir OWEN WILLIAMS, K.B.E. (Visitor), said he was grateful for the privilege of addressing The Institution and for the opportunity of contributing a few remarks on the excellent résumé which Mr. Garrard had given of the Charing Cross Bridge proposal.

He considered that the members as citizens of the greatest capital in the world must deplore the fact that the fate of Waterloo Bridge was so apparently inextricably mixed up with the solution of the Charing Cross Bridge problem. He could quite understand that as long as there was the question as to whether there should be a Charing Cross Bridge or not, the fate of Waterloo Bridge was in the balance—as to whether it should be widened, demolished, and so on; but once Charing Cross Bridge was accepted as a definite proposal, once it was only a question of whether the station should be on the north side or on the south side (whether it was a question of expense—a little more or a little less), and once the question of æsthetics had been settled, then at that moment Waterloo Bridge should, he thought, stand by itself.

Turning now to the question of expense, few people realised that motor traffic produced an expenditure far greater than the British Empire had incurred in the greatest war in history. He would give an example. America possessed to-day 25 million motor-cars. 25 million motor-cars could not be run at a less expense per week than £4 per car, including depreciation, running expenses and roads, and very few people would like to run them at that. £4 a week was the very lowest figure. 25 million motor-cars at £4 a week was £100,000,000 per week. £100,000,000 per week was £14,000,000 per day. The cost of the war, at its very height, to the British Empire had been £7,000,000 per day. Therefore America to-day was facing in motor transport twice the expenditure of the British Empire in the greatest war that the British Empire had ever fought. We were faced with the enormous problem that the world desired to move. How was that problem to be met? Certainly not by years of procrastination and the discussion of difficulties backwards and forwards.

The Charing Cross Bridge proposal provided an opportunity of spending profitably a large sum of money, incommensurably small compared with the total expenditure on traffic. Yet there was hesitation—and hesitation in the face of a vast degree of unemployment throughout the country. Therefore he felt that the problem of Charing Cross Bridge was really more than a problem of a bridge; it was the problem of whether democracy could spend money and usefully when there was unemployment such as there was at the present time.

Dealing with the details of Charing Cross Bridge, the proposal, as such—as to whether there should be a bridge or not—had, he thought, more or less been settled. Everybody agreed that Charing Cross Bridge must exist. It was an interesting thing to note that for 100 years (and it was a matter of cold calculation) if one took the centre of gravity of all the buildings that had been built in London, including the suburbs, the centre of gravity of all the buildings fluctuated within a few hundred yards of Charing Cross. If a little bit were added to Golders Green, a corresponding little bit was added to the other side. The centre of gravity of London was concentrated on that particular site—Charing Cross, and it had been like that almost since the days of the Romans. What did that mean? It meant that until an easy movement of traffic could be got at that centre, the centre being the crux of the problem, the whole growth of London and its suburbs would be held up. There could not be a place greater than its centre. Unless the centre was made efficient, and more and more efficient, then the surroundings could not be improved. Therefore, again, the problem of Charing Cross was not only one relating to the Strand, or relating to whether the railway station should be on the north bank or on the south bank; it was not a question of æsthetics or of expense, but it was a question of vital necessity to London; and when once those responsible had set themselves to find a solution to a problem like that, they should not rest until they had achieved it in a manner worthy of a city which laid claim to being the capital of the world.

Mr. FRANK HUNT, C.V.O. (Fellow), congratulated Mr. Norman Garrard on the very able way in which he had read his notes on the problem of Charing Cross Bridge. It was not often that a Paper submitted to members was read throughout in such a way that they so readily followed it. Mr. Garrard had succeeded in so reading his Paper that night, and on that ground alone he deserved the thanks of The Institution. In the second place he thought the Council of The Institution was to be congratulated on having arranged for a Paper of the kind to be prepared and read to the members. The Paper was going to have a much wider circulation than among the 200 who were present that night, in that it would be circulated to all The Institution members, some 6,000 to 7,000 strong.

Necessarily, in connection with his own work, he had had to try to find some of the ancient story with regard to the problem under discussion, but he thought the present occasion was the first when so much of the history—certainly the later history—of the matter had been brought together in one document. For that he certainly thought the Council had acted wisely in arranging for it. The Paper was one which was certain to be useful to those who had to consider the problem. The collation of the old history would itself be useful to him in the small way in which he was concerned in it. To that extent The Institution had done a useful public work.

In passing he would like to pay a tribute to the office of Hon. Secretary, which held in the organisation of The Institution quite an important position. As it happened, the office of Hon. Secretary was overshadowed by the higher office which the President held. That to his (Mr. Hunt's) mind was a little unfortunate. He himself had lived long enough to have known three members of The Institution who had held the office of Hon. Secretary. With the first one, no doubt, by reason of the great disparity between their ages, he had never been able to get into communion. The second one, the late Mr. Perceval Currey, all members dearly loved. The present holder of the office, Mr. Norman Garrard, was beloved by all. If he (Mr. Hunt) had any ambition it would be not to occupy the Presidential Chair, even if he had the chance or the probability of doing so, but he certainly would covet the occupation of the chair on the President's right. He had to confess, however, that he did not possess the qualities to do that, and therefore he would finish his professional career quite a disappointed man.

On reading the Paper two points had appeared to him as being those to which The Institution could usefully direct its attention. Mr. Garrard had pointed out that one of the features of the Royal Commission's scheme, as well as an important feature of the advisory engineer's scheme, was a considerable length of viaduct, some 2,000 yards long, from the Cavell statue to either a point where it debouched into Blackfriars Road east, or away to Westminster Bridge Road on the west. He thought The Institution could offer quite useful assistance in exploring the possibilities or the effects of the construction of a highway of that kind, straggling across London, as influencing property values. Would it assist at all in the re-development of the southern side, for which for so many years there had been agitation? Would any bridge, however constructed, help to carry the values of a district like that of the Strand across to the relatively low-value district immediately on the opposite side of the river? Distance did not account for it, but that there was a difference in value everybody knew. Was there any method or way of constructing a bridge which would have the effect of carrying values across a river? Those were essentially problems on which he thought surveyors could usefully give good and sound advice. What the answer to those problems might be it was not for him to suggest that night, but he did suggest that as surveyors they might usefully consider just those two essential problems and see whether any advice could be forthcoming for the help of those upon whom rested the responsibility for solving those problems.

It had been rather interesting to listen to the remarks of the proposer of the vote of thanks, because he could not help feeling that there was a suggestion underlying them that irresponsible bodies should have at least an equal share of responsibility, and in being the determining factor with those who had a statutory duty or a financial responsibility. A body such as Mr. Leaning had referred to had a very useful function to perform in focussing public opinion, but when Mr. Leaning suggested that such a body should begin negotiations with the Railway Company on the particular problem under discussion, it did strike one that it was beginning at the wrong end. Probably Mr. Leaning did not mean it quite so seriously as his words might lead members to think, and that no harm would probably be done by the intervention which in fact took place.

He would finish as he had started, by supporting most heartily the vote of thanks which had been proposed to Mr. Norman Garrard for the able way in which he had read the Paper that night.

Mr. H. B. CRESWELL (Visitor) remarked that his interest in the matter was that, having seen the final official plan which had been published last July, he had been so amazed that he had investigated the subject for the purpose of raising a shout. All such matters were, more or less, settled by a shout being raised—for example, Waterloo Bridge. It was only for that purpose that he wished to speak on the present occasion.

[Mr. CRESWELL then proceeded to illustrate his following remarks by means of a map.]

The map with which he wished to illustrate his remarks, and which the members now saw before them, was not the newest plan. The latter showed the railway station on the Embankment, and a site which was the finest in London—if not, indeed, in Europe—was thus proposed to be wasted. Sir Owen Williams said he did not think that the æsthetics of the matter were of much importance, but he personally considered that they were of the first importance. One had to start at the top in such a matter, and not at the bottom. The mistake now being made was that all the work was being done from the bottom, just in the same way as had been done in the past and which had made London such an intricate mass of childish makeshifts and piecemeal botchings that it was hardly possible for anyone to live in it at all, and the best brains were unable to put things right except by pulling down and building differently.

The worst of the matter was that although everyone thought those things, no one said them. It was something like the party of people all being together in a boat lost at sea, all thinking of eating one another. The man who rescued them was the man to confess what they were all thinking of, and so getting things right. If one spoke the truth people always laughed, but the matter under discussion was really a serious problem. Looked at broadly—which was the only way—the scheme was the most childish and incompetent proposal for the lay-out of London that could be imagined, and everyone present knew that it was so, although it dealt with the greatest opportunity for developing London that had occurred since the Great Fire of London. As London grew, the centre of London must grow. It was already growing; that was to say, the commercial and public centre was spreading into the residential centre. The arrangement of a high-level road involved a mass of concrete and steel rooted into the ground, which could only be got rid of by blowing up with dynamite. It meant some 2 miles of concrete vaults, 20 feet high and about 100 feet wide, blocking up the lower storeys of all the buildings frontaging on it. Those present would know the enormous depreciation in site value due to that point alone. He was not speaking of æsthetics, but of getting decent streets in which fine buildings could be erected. He wanted to keep to practical points. There was particularly the question of site values. That was a point which all present understood and could appreciate. There must be some way by which the enormous increase in site values which would result from a good lay-out on the south side could be applied to pay for the road.

Another extraordinary defect in the scheme was that there was no access to the bridge from the Embankment—which was the chief east and west traffic-way. The only object apparently in putting forward the idea of a high-level bridge was that it followed the recommendation of the Royal Commission for a double railway and road bridge—the road going above the railway. The only advantage of that high-level arrangement appeared to be that there would be a viaduct over the Strand; but it seemed that all the Embankment traffic, in order to get on to the bridge, would have to go up into Trafalgar Square or into the Strand. So far, therefore, from relieving the present congestion in that thoroughfare, the viaduct proposed by the Commission would actually accentuate it.

The PRESIDENT, in putting the vote of thanks to the meeting, said he was sure the members would agree with Mr. Frank Hunt that they were always indebted, and had been for the last ten years, to Mr. Norman Garrard for all he had done for The Institution as its Hon. Secretary. The Paper which had been read that night was one more feather in Mr. Garrard's cap, and it was to be hoped that it would be the cause of expediting the work in connection with Charing Cross Bridge.

He did not know that he hoped quite so much as Mr. Leaning that "under the peculiar conditions" the large expenditure involved ought to be found from other sources. There were other bodies who were looking out for assistance from the Road Fund. As vice-chairman of the Northamptonshire County Council Roads Committee he could assure Mr. Leaning that there were "peculiar conditions" in Northamptonshire, as he believed there were "peculiar conditions" in every other county as well. But he was sure that in the future those who had to consider the question of Charing Cross Bridge would look to Mr. Norman Garrard's Paper for guidance from the past history, and would learn from that something which would be valuable in coming to a correct conclusion.

He asked the members to accord a very hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Norman Garrard, and he was sure they would do so unanimously.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried with acclamation.

Mr. NORMAN GARRARD, in acknowledging the vote, said it had given him great pleasure to read the Paper, and he hoped it would be of interest and use to the members. There was one point to which he particularly wished to refer: he would ask Mr. Hunt to thank those who had so kindly lent the slides which had been exhibited, and he thanked Mr. Hunt for having found them for him.

The meeting then terminated.

PAPER 518.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TIMBER MERCHANT IN ESTATE FORESTRY.

By H. J. Vaughan, M.A., B.Sc. (Professional Associate).

*To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors'
Institution on Monday, 4th February, 1929.*

I.—Introductory.

The modern land agent should be master of a great number of intricate subjects in order to fulfil his varied daily duties with proper efficiency. But it is difficult for one man to acquire that essential practical experience coupled with a sound theoretical knowledge until he has reached an advanced age, when the energy and enthusiasm of youth is likely to wane. Thus it seems that many agents have not had the chance of mastering the many problems associated with timber conversion, which mastery is really essential to the proper planning of a forestry programme on a country estate.

Besides taking a keen interest in the planting and growth of trees, I have been fortunate enough to have spent two years in close association with a large firm of English timber merchants in the south of England. Thus I am able to look at the forestry problem with perhaps a somewhat unusual knowledge of the ultimate objective of the forester, namely, the saw-bench. It seems to me that even some of our eminent foresters tend to lose sight of the saw-bench when advocating and putting into practice schemes of afforestation or re-planting.

To the farmer who breeds or fattens stock it is a great advantage to have been or to be a butcher, and so to be able to look at a beast with the "seeing eye," which knows how it will cut up after death. In the same way the forester's eye should always be considering the ultimate uses of the timber which he grows; he should not regard a large cubical growth of wood per acre in the shortest time to be the sole ideal at which he should aim.

The timber merchants with whom I worked had three fixed mills and converted about 4,000 cubic feet per week, and I had a share in the valuing, buying and subsequent conversion of their requirements. I also arranged for the felling and hauling of their supplies, and most important of all, in the present context, analysed carefully their figures for costings in handling and conversion over two years. Thus all my observations and suggestions are based on actual figures taken from a business run on strictly commercial lines and run with a fair measure of success considering the troubled times through which the timber trade, like most industries, has recently been passing.

In themselves figures may be dull things, but it is the lack of facilities for collecting and intelligently analysing them, and subsequently acting on the lessons which they teach, which has been the source of loss or ruin to many commercial undertakings. And it is difficult to overstress the fact that forestry is essentially a commercial undertaking under present conditions. Thus no apology should be needed for introducing a good many figures into a Paper of this nature.

II.—The Sporting and Amenity Aspect of Forestry.

In the past the woodlands on English estates have largely been managed with a view to the provision of good coverts, from which high pheasants can be driven, or in which there is a congenial home for foxes. Again, much attention has been given to what, for want of a better term, may be called "the landscape effect" of judiciously mixed and located forest trees and shrubs.

Crushing burdens of taxation have unfortunately recently compelled most landlords to regard their woods more as a source of revenue and profit than as a source of pleasure.

But I earnestly hope that the day will never come when beauty and sport will be disregarded in this country, and do not wish it to appear that these are not important, though my main object is to discuss one of the £ s. d. sides of English forestry. It seems that in the future other considerations must take second place to financial ones; but it is surely possible, with just a little extra trouble and expense, so to plant and manage woods that they will please the eye of the artist and the sportsman as well as help to balance the estate exchequer.

III.—What the Timber Merchant wants.

1. A regular and reliable source of supply of his raw material is the first consideration to any manufacturer, and the timber merchant is no exception to this rule. Without being certain of his supply he cannot map out his budget, accept forward orders for large contracts, or maintain an expensive plant, which latter necessitates a staff of highly skilled and responsible workmen. Yet the supply of English timber in any particular area is not at all certain—so much depends upon factors over which the merchant has no control at all. Many landlords have a bitter and rather unreasonable dislike of seeing a tree felled. They would appear to prefer that their woods should be loaded with sorry skeletons in the shape of dying trees rather than have them felled at the proper time, to be replaced by a prosperous young plantation. If there are several such owners in a district, the timber merchant has to go far afield for his requirements. Then, perhaps, one or two of these so-called “tree-loving” landlords die, and their successors are anxious to turn some of the woods into cash to pay death duties, &c.; consequently there is a sudden over-supply of timber in that area, with which the local men cannot cope.

In the past a somewhat haphazard system of forestry has been followed on many estates. They have had occasional large falls of timber, or may even have a good fall for several years, and then, on account of some caprice of the owner, decide not to cut at all for perhaps five years. It has often been pointed out before that a good and dependable supply will create a steady demand, and it is surely this steady demand at which the man who is responsible for the selling of timber should aim.

Timber merchants have perhaps a somewhat unenviable reputation for rapacity and unwillingness to pay a "fair" price—whatever that may be. Though I do not wish in any way to exonerate them from the blame which is their due, yet I am anxious to demonstrate why it is that they often cannot pay high prices; among other reasons the supply of round English timber is too uncertain.

2. GOOD QUALITY HARDWOODS RATHER THAN SOFTWOODS.

It is constantly being asserted that when there is a large enough supply of English softwoods they will become more readily saleable than they are at present, and fetch a price to pay for the expenditure accumulated at compound interest entailed in bringing them to maturity. But the price at which foreign timber can be, and is, imported into this country is really the controlling factor, for no builder or other user of timber wishes to buy in anything but the cheapest market. At the present moment foreign scantlings of known quality can be bought at about 2s. 6d. per cubic foot delivered (equivalent to £20 per standard of 165 cubic feet), and with the heavy cost of haulage and labour in this country timber in the round must be bought at an extremely low price to show any profit to the converter and compete with this. The timber merchant does not wish to be bothered with all the conversion, &c., of English, Scotch, Spruce, and other softwoods, when he can with much less worry supply a more dependable article to his customers in the shape of foreign at a lower price. And he can be certain of buying an unlimited supply of foreign timber at the present moment, and get it delivered in motor-lorries direct to his yard or to the job for which it is intended.

Farmers, who are reported to be a conservative and unprogressive race, have given way to the fact that five-year-old fat cattle, weighing say 16 cwts., and three-year-old wether sheep, are not adapted to the present demand for small joints, and foresters should not lag behind farmers in adapting their scheme of production to current demands and prices.

English softwoods have, at any rate up to the present, been actually inferior in quality to the deals, &c., imported from Sweden, Russia, and the New World. But certain of our native deciduous timbers are definitely superior to what can be brought in from overseas, and where local conditions favour their growth English woodlands ought to be cropped to produce those trees where we stand unrivalled for quality and consequently for value.

It would be out of place to dilate upon the advantages possessed by many sorts of English hardwoods, but mention can be made of two instances to emphasise the point.

(A) Oak is admittedly very slow in growing, and so this, our most typical and splendid native tree, is always handicapped by the "compound interest theory." Yet for cabinet work and such purposes as waggon building, where quality and toughness are essential, English oak when properly seasoned is supreme. Where it grows soundly and cleanly it should always be saleable, and saleable at a good price.

(B) Ash. — I have sold ash to several of the largest users of this timber and they are all unanimous in saying that for quality, length of grain and strength, coupled with elasticity, English ash is supreme. No sort of foreign ash will take its place for the manufacture of tennis racquets and other sports goods, and for these latter purposes it is in marketable condition at a comparatively early age, say thirty years. Of course it will only grow to its best in certain favoured soils; but wherever there is a natural growth of ash with fine smooth bark and the other indications of good internal quality it should be extensively planted. The demand for it is certain to increase as it grows scarcer, and very scarce it is now after the clearances during the war for aeroplane purposes, &c.

IV.—Some Special Drawbacks to Native Timbers.

1. Shakiness in Oak. (Both cup or ring and heart shake.)—A badly “shaken” tree is as useless in the saw yard as a faint-hearted horse in a gruelling run with hounds. The shaky tree may look good when it is standing, just as the cowardly horse may appeal to the casual eye at the meet, but they are both a snare and a delusion when it comes to the real test. An actual case will best illustrate this point.

An area containing about 50,000 cubic feet of oak was bought at what seemed a reasonable price, and it would have been so had the timber turned out as well as was expected. But the great bulk of the trees—which were bought standing—proved to be very shaky as soon as felled, and as a result much of it literally fell to pieces on the saw bench, so that nothing but firewood could be made of it. A careful test was made in the mill, where nothing but this timber was being sawn over a period of two months. This showed, in round figures, that from 6,000 round cubic feet (T.O.B.) only 2,000 good converted feet were produced. This meant that two-thirds of the whole parcel went into firewood and was sold at 30s. per ton, whereas only one-third should have gone into firewood and two-thirds have been sold at, say, 4s. per cubic foot instead of 1s.

It is easier to point out the disastrous result of shakiness than to detect it for certain in standing timber or to account for its presence. Both scientific foresters and the keenest practical men are defeated by the problem of shake, so far as my experience goes. On the whole it is more liable to be present in exposed windswept situations, where the trees are twisted and rocked about, and on light or gravelly soils, which are not naturally so well adapted to it. The best guide in planting appears to be to leave out oak entirely where a previous crop has been “shaken,” and in buying to be guided by local experience and traditional knowledge. In every district there is some wise old woodman or timber feller who knows which woods, or section of woods, will be shaky if he can only be found and persuaded to part with his precious information.

2. Black Heart in Ash renders it quite unfit for the high-class work to which this timber is, at its best, well adapted. It may be due to over-ripeness, which is indicated by a certain hoary look at the head of the tree, accompanied by heavy bearing of seeds, or to the trees being grown in a damp waterlogged situation.

3. Heart Rot in Elm (Fornes annosus) is too well known to need amplification.

4. Dead Knots in all sorts of timber are a constant source of loss to the converter. They are most often due to injudicious thinning or pruning. Where the wound is old and water has run into it, many feet of the tree may be ruined, and nothing but a few piles or posts got out of an otherwise excellent-looking tree.

V.—The Comparison of Timber Prices in different Localities.

It is quite common to hear someone saying that he has found a very good market for his round timber and got, say, "2s. 6d. per foot for his oak," but when he is questioned as to the exact method of measuring the timber he may be somewhat vague. The local practice of measuring varies so much that a mere figure "per foot" means very little for purposes of comparison. By itself it means no more than saying that a man sold "a cart horse" for £30; what would be a bad price for a well-bred strong five-year-old would be a very good one for an old unsound animal.

What at first seems a very good price per foot may actually be a poor one if only the best butt end of sound trees are measured; whereas a poor price becomes a satisfactory one if some top or second length measure is thrown in at the same or even a lower price per foot in addition to the full prime butt. Again, so much depends on the size, both in length and girth, soundness, and cleanness of growth of timber; there are, for instance, a large number of grades of oak, each suited to different purposes and fairly saleable at different prices. The influence upon the value of the timber of location of a wood with regard to haulage facilities should need no explanation.

As I have both bought timber for a merchant and also sold it for landowners in fairly large quantities, I have seen the two points of view, and do not consider that merchants are necessarily at all unscrupulous in their methods, but at the same time it is the duty of a vendor to protect his own interests and to have the knowledge to do so properly. When trees are measured standing, the measure will generally be lower than where they are taped on the ground, as the merchant must make some allowance for possible defects; but it is safest to draw up no general rules.

Thus, in order to get a proper comparison of prices obtained for timber, the following items should always be mentioned:—

- (1) Haulage; length and nature of ground to be gone over to station or mill;
- (2) How much top or second length is measured in;
- (3) Whether measured standing or felled;
- (4) Allowance for defects, shake, unsound butts, &c.;
- (5) Allowance for bark;
- (6) Girth, length, straightness, freedom from knots, &c., of parcel.

VI.—The Forestry Commission.

In view of the great interest aroused among most landowners, agents, &c., by the operations of the Commission, it seems desirable to include in this Paper some observations on their work, judged from the standpoint of the timber merchant.

The writer has several good friends amongst the officers of the Commission, and feels great sympathy with the fine and useful work which they have been appointed to do, so hesitates to indulge in anything which might be construed as harsh criticism of their methods. Yet there appears to be room for questioning the wisdom, from the practical point of view, of some of their main objectives and the manner of attaining them.

Two somewhat strangely contrasted sets of people, namely, timber merchants and lovers of a comely English countryside, somewhat object to what appears to be the main guiding principle of the Commissioners' programme, namely, the planting up of a maximum area in a minimum time with conifers of various sorts—and especially spruce and Douglas fir. To the unprofessional æsthetic eye these softwood plantations are an alien displeasing feature in the landscape, at any rate of the southern and midland counties. The timber merchant, on his part, cannot think they will develop into anything which will be really satisfactory from the commercial point of view. The reason for this heavy planting of conifers is, of course, the world shortage of softwoods, which is said to be so near at hand, though the statistics on which this future famine is based are in some measure open to question.

The quality of British-grown softwoods is at present certainly inferior to that of imported, due partly to the much more rapid growth—and consequently bigger annual rings and less strength, and partly to an excessive number of bad knots. These can only in part be counteracted by superior silvicultural methods to those obtaining on most English estates in the past, and it is unlikely that our own conifers will ever equal those grown in such countries as Sweden. Thus it would seem much better to concentrate on growing hardwoods wherever possible—in which our native trees have a real superiority—rather than to try to meet a questionable world famine with what is bound to be but a very small proportion of our total requirement of deals, &c., for building and other constructional work.

Certainly many areas which have been acquired and planted by the Commission are too poor and exposed, or otherwise unsuitable for the growth of good hardwoods. But I have seen at least one area, parts of which carried an old growth of quite good oak and ash, which were being rapidly replaced—as felled—by spruce, &c. This seems the greatest pity, as our hardwoods will always be valuable, and so should surely be concentrated on where they would seem well able to be grown. And the State, rather than private owners, with a limited life and great uncertainty as to being able to keep up and retain their properties, must be looked to to recoup our growth of hardwoods, so sadly depleted during and since the war. It would be obvious waste to turn the fine pastures of the Midlands into a rabbit warren, which may be quite a good investment on the poor chalk hills of Hampshire, and in the same way it is a waste of opportunities to rear spruce where there might be good sound oak and ash.

Anyone travelling through England with an observant eye is distressed by the large acreage of devastated woodland to be seen almost everywhere, where only a few gaunt wounded trees stand up amidst a waste of willow, herb, bramble, and bracken. Yet rather than make every effort to get these areas properly replanted, the Forestry Commission is fast acquiring great tracts of bare barren heath, &c., where none but the poorest most stunted trees will grow. There are undoubtedly administrative difficulties in acquiring and managing scattered woods—perhaps of small size—yet even the most scattered felled areas provide a far better raw material in the shape of a forest soil than much of the sandy heaths and inclement mountain sides upon which the Commission concentrates.

The Government grants towards replanting by private owners have certainly been a step in the right direction; but, at the same time, there is a great deal of leeway to be made up before our existing woodland areas are in anything like fair working order. Professor F. S. Stebbing's recent book on The Forestry Problem in Great Britain elaborates this point most lucidly and convincingly.

Determination to reduce expenses to a minimum in a Government department is laudable, but the Forestry Commission appears to be over-economical in some of its methods. They experience some difficulty in getting the right sturdy intelligent class of woodmen: but this is not surprising in view of the low wages which they pay—yet good forestry is impossible without good men in the woods. All the work that possibly can be is put on a low piece-work basis in order to save expense. As a result each job appears to be done cheaply, perhaps, per acre or per thousand of trees planted, but the ultimate result is that many of the young trees die, and thus the whole outlay on them is quite wasted.

One example of bad economy will illustrate the folly of doing things too cheaply: In one area the Government men are paid about 35 per cent. less for felling oak timber than timber merchants' men are paid for doing the same sort of work by the piece. As a result the trees are very badly trimmed and left rough and unpleasing to the eye, which means that the buyers will only bid a low price for them when they are sold by measure felled, and what amounts to $\frac{1}{2}d.$ a foot saved in felling causes a lowering of probably 2d. or 3d. per foot in the selling price. The Government loses, and their men are discontented, as they cannot do their work properly on the money, and can only earn a bare living when the work is scamped.

VII.—Waste in Conversion.

The price at which round timber can be bought, and the converted scantlings or plauks sold, may be gauged with reasonable exactness for any particular parcel. But there is one supremely important factor affecting the merchants' balance sheet and the price which any lot of timber is worth to him in the round, and that is the percentage waste in conversion.

1. Definition of Terms.—As used in this Paper “the percentage of waste” means the percentage difference between the round measure of a tree (tape over bark) and the measure of converted scantlings, &c., cut from that tree.

Thus, if from a tree measuring 60 cubic feet (Hoppus T.O.B.) 40 cubic feet converted timber are sawn, waste = 20 in 60 = $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent.

If, from the same tree, 45 converted feet are sawn, waste = 15 in 60 = 25 per cent. The difference between the live weight of a beast and the dead weight of dressed carcase is a close parallel to the waste in a tree after it is sawn and ready for use.

2. Sources of Waste.—Outside slabs, sawdust, and unsound and rotten parts of a tree, I am classing as waste. Objection might be raised to this on the ground that a lot of firewood is saleable and is not wasted at all, or is used in the engine. But in the mills on which my figures are based the engines ran mostly on wood, and there was relatively little left for sale. Thus, in one year only, about 4,000 cubic feet of firewood was sold, against a total consumption of 90,000 cubic feet, which is equivalent to 1 cubic foot per 22 round feet. If firewood is priced at £1 10s. per ton, and 30 cubic feet weighs a ton, then the firewood price is equal to 1s. per cubic foot, which means that the value of firewood produced from 1 round foot is only $\frac{1}{2}d.$ on the above figures. Had coal been bought and the firewood sold, the "other expenses" in my figures would be higher.

3. Examples of Waste worked on a Costing Basis.—Take an oak of 60 cubic feet at 2s. per cubic foot in the wood, add to this 1s. 6d. per round cubic foot for subsequent outlay on haulage, conversion, rent, management and "other expenses" as explained later.

Thus the tree bears a total cost of 2s. plus 1s. 6d. per cubic foot = 3s. 6d. This on 60 cubic feet amounts to £10 10s.

If the tree yields 45 converted (waste of 15 in 60 or 25%), then the 45 converted feet must bear the cost of £10 10s. or 4s. 8d. per cubic foot nearly.

If the tree yields 40 converted feet (waste 20 in 60 or 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ %), then the 40 converted feet must bear the cost of £10 10s. or 5s. 3d. per cubic foot.

This means that there is 7d. per cubic foot greater margin of profit on the tree with the lower percentage of waste, assuming, of course, that the converted timber is of the same value per foot in both cases.

VIII.—Specimen Calculations of Costings of Timber Conversion.

For many reasons it is not discreet and desirable—nor in this case necessary—to illustrate the points at issue by giving exact particulars of all outgoings, receipts, &c., of the mills with which I was connected. The object of giving these figures is to provide a sound and satisfactory basis to anyone interested in an estate sawmill on which he can base his calculation to find on what items he is really making a profit. To contend that my exact figures can be applied as they stand to the working up of all sorts of classes of timber would be impossible.

But, as stated earlier, my figures are all based on a careful analysis of the records for wages, and other outgoings and receipts on the one hand, and the quantities of round timber passing into, and sawn timber passing out of, the mills, on the other hand. Some information, however, about the equipment of the mills and the classes of the timber handled will not be out of place here.

The mills were all worked by steam engines, running mostly on firewood and mill waste, such as bark and a little sawdust. One of them had an excellent band-saw, and the others had good rack, horizontal and push-bench saws. Oak was the timber used in the greatest bulk, about 53 per cent. of the whole, with 25 per cent. elm, 15 per cent. spruce and larch, and 7 per cent. ash, beech, &c. A large part of the oak was sold as waggon scantlings, while there was a good local demand for both oak and softwood fencing materials, and a heavy demand for elm coffin boards.

Haulage was done by steam tractors, three of which were kept in almost constant use, by horses, both hired and owned by the proprietors of the mills, and also by rail.

Each parcel of English timber, and often many of the trees in a large individual parcel, vary so much that great caution must be exercised lest hasty conclusions should be drawn from tests performed on one or two trees only in the saw-yard. It is, for instance, only too easy to measure one rather nice butt before it goes on the bench and then measure the sawn scantlings from it, which might show that a tree of 60 round feet yielded 50 converted feet. But this would give far too rosy an impression of a low percentage of waste, and the only satisfactory thing is to measure all the timber, both good and bad, as it goes in the yard and is cut, and all, the sawn timber produced over a good long period—preferably several months or a full year.

Below are given two examples to show how these calculations can be made, though there are no doubt many other satisfactory ways of presenting the figures, arranging them in a slightly different form. A few notes explaining the various items of cost are here desirable:—

- (1) Timber standing in Wood.—Explains itself.
- (2) Felling.—The fellers are paid piece-work at the rate of 12s. 6d. per 100 cubic feet for oak, and 8s. 4d. per 100 cubic feet for spruce, in these examples. They are based on timber bought standing, though a large quantity is bought on the ground and felled by the vendor.
- (3) Hauling.—To mill is here put at 6d., which is what a contract horse carter would probably demand for a distance where there is some deep ground to get through from the covert to a hard road and it is then about 6 or 7 miles to the mill. In many cases the haulage cost will be much more, especially when the trees have to be put on rail.
- (4) Wages on Conversion.—Represent the wages of men actually working the saws and of those who are cross-cutting, peeling gritty bark off, and stacking the timber to season in the drying-sheds.

Two concrete examples illustrate how this figure is obtained :—

Mill A.—Average of 5 weeks working, cut up 1,379 cubic feet per week. Wages £28 10s. 10d.
Average per foot = 4·9 pence

Mill B.—Average of 6 weeks' working, cut up 938 cubic feet per week. Wages £27 9s.
Average per foot = 7 pence

Mill A is so much better equipped with machinery and more convenient to work than Mill B.

- (5) Other Expenses.—This is a rather wide heading, and comprises salaries of managers, clerks and commercial travellers, rent and rates, depreciation and repairs to plant and machinery, travelling expenses, insurances, &c.

These figures are taken direct from the annual summary of accounts of the mills in question—and it is purely a coincidence that they nearly correspond with the expenditure in wages per cubic foot.

Rather less per cubic foot is put down against the lower value timber to illustrate the principle that the best class of timber may rightly be looked to to carry a higher profit per cubic foot.

Up to this point all the outgoings are based on the round timber measure, and now the most important question of waste must be considered.

- (6) Waste.—Where the waste is one-third of the round measure for the example of oak, it means that every 6 round feet at 3s. per foot will cost 18s.; 6 round feet will produce 4 converted feet, and then 4 converted feet bear the same cost of 18s., or 4s. 6d. per foot. Thus, where waste is one-third, half the cost on a round foot must be added to it to arrive at the cost on a converted foot.

EXAMPLES.

	Fair quality Oak per cubic foot.	Spruce per cubic foot.
	s. d.	s. d.
(1) Timber standing in wood (tape over bark)	1 5½	3
(2) Felling	1½	1
(3) Hauling from wood to mill ... say	6	6

To this add—
(4) Wages on conversion	6	6
(5) Other expenses	5*	4

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TIMBER MERCHANT IN ESTATE FORESTRY.

Mr. C. B. FISHER, C.B.E. (President), in the Chair.

The PRESIDENT said he was sorry that the attendance was not larger, but it must be remembered that the country members had a very long distance to come. Many of them, however, would be glad to find such an able Paper written by so young a man and recorded in the Journal.

Mr. ALAN ARNOLD (Member of Council) was very glad of an opportunity to propose a vote of thanks, because he was sure they were all agreed that Mr. Vaughan had read them an excellent Paper, and one which would satisfy and please most of the 6,000 members of The Institution who would read it.

There might be some who would not quite agree with all Mr. Vaughan had written, and certainly he did not agree with his statements about the cold Hampshire hills being turned into rabbit warrens. But then, Mr. Vaughan did not know as much about Hampshire as he (the speaker) did. Was not it the fact that on the hills near Kingsclere seven or eight Derby winners had been bred? Was not it a fact that on the Hampshire downs the finest flocks of sheep in the world had been reared, and that in Dorsetshire, where some of the landowners had fenced in the downs and provided water, one saw what had been almost barren areas of downland carrying herds of milking cows and fattening bullocks? He only gave that as an instance to show Mr. Vaughan that there was more virtue in the Hampshire downs than he thought there was. He had heard it said that apple trees could be grown there, though personally he preferred beech. He was sure there must be some in the room who had seen the beautiful beech hangers among the Hampshire hills. They must not go away with the idea that they were so exposed that they would not grow beech. Their President, who was educated at Winchester, had spent some hours looking at the clump of beech trees on St. Catherine's Hill, on the summit of which, in 1788 or thereabouts, a clump of beech trees had been planted. A great many of them were there to-day, though the hill was exposed without any shelter at all. So it was quite certain that beech trees would grow on those downland areas under the most adverse conditions if they were properly planted originally.

He was not going to speak upon many of the items in

Mr. Vaughan's Paper, because he knew there were other speakers who would deal with the details connected with saw-mills, &c. He would like, however, to refer to pages 158, &c., where Mr. Vaughan made some reference to the Forestry Commission. He was sure, as a body of professional men, they were all out to give any assistance they could to the Forestry Commission. They all regarded it as a Government department which was doing most useful work. They might criticise their methods, for they, like everybody, made mistakes, even the assistant Commissioner, Professor Pritchard. He was going to accuse Professor Pritchard of having made one very serious mistake in his life. Three or four years ago, when the Royal Show was held at Reading, he (the speaker) was bold enough to enter a plantation he had planted in Derbyshire for the Warden and Fellows of Winchester College. He would never have done so were it not that he was perfectly certain he would get the silver medal awarded in the plantation class. Professor Pritchard went down there and spent a day looking at it. He had no doubt the Professor came back and thought what a fine plantation it was, but instead of sending him a silver medal he had only sent him a bronze one. He had always felt that that was a serious mistake.

That plantation was another instance of what could be done with those bare downlands, for in 1912 the 12 acres on which it stood were bare Dorset downland. If one went there he was certain one would find a perfect planting of larch fir, planted 5 feet apart with hardly a failure, and many of the trees 40 feet or 50 feet long. But those trees had not been planted as he had seen the Forestry Commission plant others on some of the downs in Hampshire. He was no believer in placing trees on bare downland any more than violets in a gravel path, if one could put them in a well-dug border on either side. If one had to plant downland, one had to go to more expense than had been incurred in some instances where the Forestry Commission had planted. In the case quoted above, he gave his farming tenant instructions to plough the land and get it in the same order as he would do if he were putting the field into wheat.

That cost from £2 to £3 an acre, but he could not help thinking that it was money very well spent.

With this note of criticism he wished to say how greatly the work of the Forestry Commission was welcomed and supported by all who had the re-afforestation of England at heart. He desired, in conclusion, to congratulate Mr. Vaughan on his Paper, and to propose a hearty vote of thanks to him for reading it.

Sir GEORGE COURTHOPE, Bt., M.P. (Associate of Council), had very great pleasure in seconding the motion which had been moved by Mr. Arnold for a vote of thanks to Mr. Vaughan for his very interesting Paper. It was of great value, the more so because it contained a good deal of controversial matter.

If one looked at forestry from the landowner's point of view only, or from the merchant's point of view only, one never learned very much, but when one brought the two into conflict, and friendly conflict, as Mr. Vaughan's Paper had done, each learned something of the other's secrets, and both sides tended to gain. He was particularly glad that at that time a Paper should have been read on the position of the timber merchant in connection with estate forestry, because he did not think that position was as satisfactory as it ought to be, and he was pleased for that reason to see Mr. Horton there. He did not suggest for one moment it was entirely the fault of the timber merchants, although they might have some share of blame. It was very largely the fault of want of organisation on the part of the landowners. But he was quite certain that if the woodland owners of England, and the timber merchants who wanted to make a living by handling the timbers that those estates grew, they would have to put their houses into much better order than was the case to-day. He was not suggesting for a moment that prominent exceptions could not be found on both sides to the truth of what he was saying. There were many timber merchants whose business was admirably organised. There were many estates with admirable forestry schemes, but, taking them all round, the trade on the one side and the estates on the other, there was great room for improvement.

From the timber merchant's point of view it was important that the question should be studied seriously during the next few years. He spoke with diffidence in the presence of the Chairman of the Forestry Commission, Lord Clinton, but he felt that there must be a very great opening for the home-grown timber trade in the operations of the Forestry Commission, with planting going on at the rate of over 20,000 acres a year. One could say with certainty that in a given number of years there would be an annual yield of certain varieties to be handled, a yield which would grow year by year for many years before the maximum was reached. Were the timber trade of the country going to handle that, or were they, by faulty handling, going to compel the Commissioners of the future to take over conversion and marketing for themselves? It was a big problem which it was well worth while for the timber trade to study during the next few years.

Before he sat down he would like to refer to one or two points in Mr. Vaughan's Paper. He was glad to read what it said about the sporting and amenity aspect of forestry. He believed it was wrong to argue that sound economic forestry was inconsistent either with landscape or with sporting. It was true that one had to vary the conifer plantations if one was dealing with conifers with deciduous hardwoods at the edges, but he would suggest to Mr. Vaughan the effect of irregularity of outline could be secured quite as well by an arrangement of a hardwood belt on the outside as by a crooked fence. This irregularity of outline, however, must be secured, and if it were a sporting district one wanted hardwoods for the pheasants to rise from, because if the big plantation were pure conifer one would never find, throughout its life, it would hold the birds satisfactorily. Although it might be a trouble to make the addition of belts of mixed hardwoods on the outside of a conifer plantation, and might add slightly to the expense, one was really serving a very useful purpose, owing to the security thereby afforded against fire.

Mr. Vaughan, in common, he thought, with practically the whole of the timber trade, had rather doubted the soundness of the opinions expressed by the foresters as to the rate of exhaustion of commercial softwoods in the world. He believed the foresters were right, but he could quite understand that the timber trade should hold the view that it did, because, on going into the market, they were still able to get commercial softwoods in reasonable quantities at a reasonable price. But the general average quality of imported commercial softwoods was declining and the general average price was going up. That was an indication that the countries of the world were beginning to take stock of their resources, and beginning to fear the future. The United States of America began to do so about four or five years ago. Canada was doing so at the moment, and Europe was begining to take stock. It was generally accepted by the forestry departments of the world that there were only three countries in the whole world, where commercial softwoods were grown, which were not felling at a greater rate than the annual increment. These were Sweden, Finland, and Montenegro, though Montenegro probably hardly counted. It might be that estimates in terms of years would vary a great deal, but what he maintained was that whether the shortage began in 20 years, or 50 years, or 80 years, there was a time ahead when commercial softwoods were going to be very scarce and very expensive before the nations, which were not yet planting on a large scale, could bring their crops to maturity. He thought, therefore, that the policy of the Government in starting the Forestry Commission was sound, and from the point of view of the private owner there was a great prospect that prices might be very different in the next generation from those now ruling.

He could say nothing more useful in the presence of Lord Clinton and Mr. Pritchard, who would speak for the Forestry Commission, except this: Mr. Vaughan had criticised the planting of conifers instead of oak, but he asked them all to consider whether it was ever wise in any circumstances to transplant oak, as he firmly believed they would never get sound oak once the tap root had been broken. That was the tradition of his county, which probably grew as fine oak as any part of the world. He said seriously that in his firm belief one could never transplant an oak tree without damaging its future growth. They must go in for sowing, or natural regeneration for oak, and not for transplanting. He hoped Mr. Vaughan would not think he had been anxious to criticise his Paper in raising those points. He thanked him most cordially for the great interest he had aroused.

The PRESIDENT said he was sure they were very gratified that Lord Clinton, the Chairman of the Forestry Commission, had been able to spare the time to come and join in the discussion. Mr. Horton, however, who was the President of the Home-grown Timber Traders' Federation, had unfortunately had to leave, and wished to express his regret that he could not stay and speak.

The Rt. Hon. LORD CLINTON (Visitor) said it was a great privilege to be allowed to be present and take some part in the discussion upon the very interesting Paper which Mr. Vaughan had read. He would like to join with Mr. Arnold and Sir George Courthope in the thanks they had given to Mr. Vaughan. It was a Paper which had raised questions of great interest to him, an interest which had been by no means allayed by the references made to the Forestry Commission.

He agreed very much with Mr. Arnold, who, while giving the Commission a very considerable amount of support in his speech, recognised, as he recognised, that they were open to criticism. The work they were beginning was on a larger scale than had ever been attempted in Great Britain, and they were to a certain extent feeling their way. While they did their best to attain success, others would take a different view of their methods from that which they took themselves. He hoped they would not think he resented criticism; he was certain it was good for his soul, and welcomed it, particularly on an occasion of that kind, when he was able to face his critic and give, if not a complete reply, at all events some explanation.

In one or two different parts of the Paper there was some criticism, not entirely new to him, to the effect that the Forestry Commission were planting conifers of a comparatively poor type on too large a scale. Mr. Vaughan had said, and it was undoubtedly true, that the growing of the largest possible cubical content of timber in as quick as possible time should not be the sole aim of a forester. He was absolutely in agreement with that. They had a great many other points which, naturally, they had to attend to, such as the future demands of the market, the proper growth of the trees which they planted, the requirements of the trade, and many other things. But he was not going to leave out altogether the real advantage of an attempt to grow the biggest bulk in the quickest possible time, as there were certain financial considerations which would make it advisable. There was the theory (and it was much more than a theory so far as they were concerned) of compound interest, which made long rotations a source of anything but profit to those who set out to plant. That was the financial side which had to be considered.

Mr. Vaughan attributed their rather foolish attempts to grow so much softwoods to the fear, as he called it, of a world famine. Sir George Courthope had dealt very well with that point, and he was only going to add one more word. While they knew that the British timber trade did not regard a future difficulty in obtaining timber as probable, there was no forestry department in the world which took that view. At the recent Empire Timber Conferences every representative present was confident that not only their own country but the whole world was to-day consuming either for use, or losing in fire and other ways, a larger amount of timber than could be replaced by the annual increment; in other words, they were eating into their capital of timber and (in how long a time nobody could say) a shortage must come. He used the word "shortage," but Mr. Vaughan used the word "famine."

That was a word he had never used, as he had never believed in a famine of timber. But he did believe, sooner or later, there would come a difficulty in obtaining timber, which would lead to higher prices and to greater economy in its use.

While finance, and possibly shortage, were important factors for consideration in planting, they did not in any sense govern the Commission's policy. Their only policy was one which was easy to state but not altogether so easy to apply, namely, to plant such trees as were suitable for the soil in which they grew. He submitted there could be no other principle of policy for the forester. They were, by circumstances, committed to a somewhat inferior class of tree because the ground upon which they grew them was in itself inferior. They were limited, as many would know, to a fixed price per acre, £4 an acre. One could not expect to grow the best trees on poor land. Unfortunately all the trees which they would like to grow, such as oak or ash or larch, were very exacting in their demands upon the soil. It was no good putting those trees into land which was not suited for them. Anybody who attempted to do that would subject himself to the very severest penalties, and there were instances of it all round them.

Many of them would know, as Mr. Vaughan knew, the New Forest. Well, look at the oak which was planted there in the early part of the 19th century, which was about 120 years old. He was confident it was never going to make profitable timber, even if it remained there another 100 years or more. That was mainly due to the fact that the soil was unsuited to the growth of oak. It might have grown other timber, but it certainly would not grow the species of oak they wanted to have.

Even a better instance was that of larch. Anybody who had been connected with timber estates for a long period would remember that 40 or 50 years ago everyone was told that the only profitable timber to grow was larch. Most of them, without any sufficient knowledge of the characteristics of the tree, planted it wherever they were planting, in the most unsuitable places. There was nothing which had caused a larger waste of money on estates than the planting of larch in a wholesale way where it never had and never could produce a crop. That was the first point in the way of dealing with the references which Mr. Vaughan had made to the Commission.

There was another point which he might have time to deal with. Mr. Vaughan suggested, and they would all agree with him, that they must deplore the amount of devastated woodland throughout the country, but went on to say—and here he disagreed—that they, as a Commission, did not make an effort to obtain that land, but preferred to plant barren hillsides. As a matter of fact they did both. There were several points to be considered on the question of devastated woodlands. To buy devastated woodlands for planting was easy—they cost very little—but when one came to prepare it for planting, it was a different story. When the timber merchant had done with woodland, it was frequently a tangled mass of jungle, tops, branches, and valueless trunks, and after a year was grown through with every kind of natural scrub, bramble, hawthorn, &c., which was very costly indeed to remove. They had had instances where it had cost them £8 an acre to clear that land. £8 was an extreme price, but £3 was not uncommon. Much of that devastated woodland would be dear even if given to them. Then it was costly in another way. The unit of plantation, in England particularly, was a very small one indeed, and small plantations were inclined to be extravagant. It was all very well on an estate where one had one's staff and one's centre, getting these small areas planted all round, but when one only had certain fixed centres, as the estate had, in which it could be dealt with, the cost of supervision, administration, labour, and especially fencing, became extravagantly heavy when dealing with very small areas. It was curious how the latter item mounted up. Rabbit netting, for instance, at 6*d.* a yard, cost £3 12*s.* an acre on a 5-acre plantation, and £2 2*s.* an acre on a 10-acre plantation, both of which were heavy burdens to carry through the rotation. When the Commission planted on its large areas the figure came down to about 14*s.* an acre on a 100-acre plantation, which was quite enough, but not so serious a burden as in the case of the very small areas.

Apart from the cost, there was another difficulty as to the availability of the land. It was a large area. Quite apart from the war fellings, the devastation of their woodlands had been a continuing process, and must continue to be so, due very largely to the incidence of death duties. A man succeeding to an estate naturally and rightly—wrong though it might be from the forestry point of view—felled his timber to get the means to meet the death duties. Then the estates themselves were broken up. The farmer did not want to plant, and was not going to sell it to the Commission for planting because he wanted it for rough grazing himself. One saw this on a piece of land in England where every tree had been cut down and the land put to other uses. That was a big area, accounting for a large amount of devastated land, which could never be obtained for planting because the owner wanted it for other purposes.

Apart from these details, there still remained a remarkably large area which would eventually become available for the Commissioners' planting. So far from not making any effort to obtain that, they were obtaining it as fast as they could, and he thought the following figures might be of interest. Up to the beginning of the present planting season they had planted 119,000 acres. Out of that area 32,000 acres were on this devastated or cut-over land. In addition to that, by the assistance of State grants, private owners had planted 50,000 acres, or a little more, all upon that same land. Further than that, they had, by the assistance of grants, prepared for planting 20,000 acres, which were coming on for planting in the course of the next year or so. A study of those figures would show them that out of the total planting by the State or by State aid something close upon one-half had covered the devastated area. Those were two points which he was glad to have had the opportunity of mentioning. Although one could not hope to convince one's critics, at all events he was glad to have had an opportunity of explaining, to some extent, the methods which must govern the policy of a State Forestry Department.

Mr. JOHN MAUGHAN (Professional Associate Member of Council), after congratulating Mr. Vaughan on his Paper, said that the lecturer was evidently a sportsman, because he noticed that when he drew a comparison he went back to the old mare. Whether there would be any large estates in the future, Heaven only knew; but if there were, it would certainly be wise to plant, because plantations, as Mr. Vaughan had said, added to the amenity value of property, and it was therefore not reasonable to charge the whole of the cost of planting against the woods account, because if it were not for the amenity value, which included sporting, most of our country houses would be unoccupied. Then timber, unless assessed under Schedule D, paid no income or super tax. The only taxable thing about it was the land on which it was grown, and this, if full advantage were taken of the provisions of the Rating Act, 1874, was almost negligible. In an Exeter case the rateable value was reduced to 4*d.* per acre, and in Lord Downe's case, in Yorkshire, the greater part of the area to 3*d.* The new assessments, Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, should be carefully examined, for in his part of the country assessment committees seemed to have run riot somewhat. They had increased the gross from 1*s.* 6*d.* to a flat rate of 5*s.* per acre, and offered no objection to accepting 2*s.* 6*d.* The 1*s.* 6*d.* was agreed to only where the appellant owned the whole of the parish or township.

Another point in favour of planting was that timber was not liable to death duties until realised, and if a minor planted and realised the crop during his lifetime no duties were payable. Even if he died before the crop was matured it was only valued to his successor at its then value.

It was very important that a value should be placed on the timber at each death, to which the Inland Revenue Department had agreed, as that fixed the amount of the liability; and there were no duties on increment.

The Inland Revenue Department interpreted the words

"necessary outgoings" fairly widely, but did not include the rent of the land planted, on the ground that it was a loss and that a loss was not an outgoing. The logic of that was difficult to understand, especially as probate and succession duties were payable on the land.

The Forestry Commission were planting land in the neighbourhood of Scarborough, which appeared to him to be unsuitable. He referred to Ebberstone and Wykeham. On similar land in his neighbourhood the Scots pine of 100 years' growth averaged only 8 feet. It was sold to the Home-Grown Timber Committee at a very reasonable price, but prior to the war it had no market value on account of its inaccessible position.

Mr. Vaughan's estimate of the cost in the wood of marketing of spruce, viz., 2s. 3d. per foot cube, worked out on the St. Petersburg standard of 165 cubic feet at £18 per standard.

Mr. VAUGHAN remarked that there was no profit on that.

Mr. MAUGHAN asked if that was in deals 11 inches by 3 inches.

Mr. VAUGHAN: Yes.

Mr. MAUGHAN said he had never purchased white wood deals, and therefore did not know what the price might be.

He called attention to the extensive deal in Baltic timber by some of the big firms of merchants running into several millions of money which would affect the home market.

Mr. LESLIE WOOD (Fellow) thought that the interest in the Paper was partly due to the controversial matter it contained, and also because it dealt with an entirely new subject, namely, the relationship between the timber merchant and the producer, a subject which, so far as he knew, had never been treated adequately before. It was very important and one which would develop much more in the future. If one looked back, say, twenty or thirty years, one found that the timber merchant was distrusted by the owner and to a certain extent by the agent. He could not help thinking that the timber merchant looked at the agent, and perhaps at the owner too, as fair game for his business. By degrees a change had come over the scene. He wished Mr. Horton had been able to stay, because he was a man who was doing much to bring about a better relationship and understanding between the timber merchant and the producer, and so benefit forestry in the future. In his opinion lack of progression in forestry generally, and particularly the growing of hard woods, had been due to the timber rings of the past. It was highly detrimental to any business that one party should combine against the other to try, if he might use the expression, to "do him down." It was bound to be reflected sooner or later in the actions of the person done down, for, as they all knew, sooner or later even a worm would turn.

Mr. Vaughan had raised a very nice point in asking whether or not they were right in growing the largest quantity of timber in the smallest possible amount of time. On the surface foresters had always accepted that as one of the greatest maxims in forestry, and when they were suddenly told that it was wrong they required time to think it out. On the face of it one was still inclined to accept it as a proper rule, and one which it would be very dangerous to abandon until more was known of the work of the Forest Products Board. In the case of willow which produced the cricket bat, and ash which produced the tennis racket and hockey stick, the idea was to get the quickest-grown timber to get the best result. It was quite possible that when the work of the Forest Products Board developed they would know far more about the desirability of rapid production, and it was quite possible they would find that some timbers should be slowly grown for certain purposes and quickly for others according to the strain that had to be taken. Those who had been down to see the work of the Forest Products Board could not help being impressed by their work, and their reports would be awaited with a great deal of interest. When they were published he believed they would throw considerable light on the question.

Turning to the question of measurement, it was always a matter of opinion as to whether it was advisable to measure down or to measure standing. A good many people thought, and they might be right, that, if one measured down, one got a better and a truer measure. But he had always found it was extremely difficult to define in a contract how one was going to measure down. There was more trouble and more difficulty in settling questions when timber was measured down than when measured and sold standing. Measured standing one had finished with it; measured down one had to consider whether the timber had to be taken up to a certain point—whether the vendor had to deal with a bole only, and, if so, what was the bole; or if one were taking the timber to the first fork, what was the first fork and where did the falling-off come. The agent had to deal with questions of length when he was dealing with conifers and questions of shakes and unsound timber. Therefore there was more controversy and difficulty in measuring timber down than there was when it was taken standing. Then there was this great difficulty. If one had to sell 10, 15 or 20 acres of timber, it was extremely difficult to get the timber merchant to take the trouble to measure his timber so as to be able to give a price which fitted in with one's own view. He had a large area to cover, and had not the time or inclination systematically to measure up the timber tree by tree or by any other method. The result was he was very apt to rely simply upon his knowledge (and it was very often an astute knowledge) of the quantity of timber per acre, and naturally would keep on the safe side in making an estimate. To estimate was always a danger as it was always difficult, and the more one had of timber work the more one felt that that was so. Latterly he (the speaker) had been acting on a system which he thought should be developed much more in the future, namely, to measure timber on the basal area system. That had the following advantage: One not only got a much truer result in the measurement, but one was able to put into the hands of the timber merchant a complete schedule of the timber, and to tell him that in the wood he was going to measure it was not a matter of guessing how many trees there were. He could be told there were, say, 5,000 trees, and could be given the average quarter-girth. That was perfectly certain knowledge, and it was for the timber merchant to calculate what was the average content of a tree of that kind. He had found that the timber merchants were perfectly prepared to accept a schedule of timber in that way, and when one had got as far as that, one had gone a long way towards solving the difficulty of selling areas to timber merchants. That was one of the reasons, apart from the question of the difficulty of measuring felled timber, which led him to think it was a better method to sell standing when one had a large quantity. It was quicker and more accurate and more likely to get a proper price from the timber merchant. In conclusion he would like to say once more how indebted they were to Mr. Vaughan for bringing to their attention a subject of absorbing interest, and he hoped that the forestry world would have the services of Mr. Vaughan in other directions in years to come.

Dr. H. A. PRITCHARD, O.B.E. (Fellow), also thanked Mr. Vaughan for his Paper and for the very gentle way in which he had handled the Commission. There were one or two points only which he would touch upon, because the general policy of the Commission had been so fully dealt with by the Chairman of the Commission, Lord Clinton, and by Sir George Courthope. Before he dealt with the points referred to he would like to know something more about the area which was suitable for oak, but which Mr. Vaughan definitely stated had been used for the growing of conifers. The difficulty of dealing with devastated areas had already been referred to by Lord Clinton. When the Commission planted conifers on what were formerly hardwood areas, it was with the definite object of growing something which would kill the appalling growth which usually followed clearing, frequently blackthorn, briars, and coppice growth, which was on the area, and getting it covered quickly in order that they could then use the land in a perfectly clean state and with some hope of raising a hardwood crop on it. In other words, they grew what might be called a catch crop. The growth of oak was a very difficult problem. He very largely agreed with what Sir George Courthope had said.

As regards the British forester, he was not sure that in the past he had not been able to show what was the only way of growing oak, that is to say, growing it as a standard over coppice, or even more widely grown than that. He was satisfied that, with two or three exceptions, he had never seen first-class oak produced in a plantation except as very scattered trees with well-developed crowns. Another reason for growing it in an open way was that it would probably produce timber, certainly marketable timber, quicker than in a plantation. One did not want the tremendous length which was mainly the object of dense plantation growth. As soon as an oak got to 25 feet or 30 feet in height, the sooner it was induced to put on diameter the better, and the only way to do that was to allow it to have as much room for crown expansion as was possible.

There was a great tendency, to which he thought the time was opportune to draw attention, to plant ash everywhere, in very much the same way that larch was planted in the period to which Lord Clinton had referred. There were more poor almost derelict ash plantations about the country than he had expected to find, for the simple reason that everybody said it would grow very quickly, and it was a timber which was the most valuable that could be produced. The result had been that many areas were planted with ash which never could grow ash, or, if it did grow, it would not produce much more than a pole, or if it did grow to any size would be of poor quality and probably black-hearted. Ash was one of the most exacting trees, and there was comparatively little soil on which it could be satisfactorily grown. He was quite satisfied that the Commission were doing the right thing in avoiding being rushed into planting very large areas of hardwoods when proper soil was not available, and he was particularly glad that they were taking great care only to grow ash, at all events, in soil and situations suitable for it. A series of experiments were going on throughout the country as the best means of establishing oak plantations.

He was glad to say the results were pointing to sowing as being not only very effective but cheap, and certainly a more reliable way of establishing an oak crop than planting. Contrary to all knowledge or teaching in the past, they were finding that the only safe way of sowing the acorn was to plant it deep, instead of 1 or 2 inches. They were getting the best results in the way of freedom from depredation by birds and other animals by sowing acorns at a depth between 4 and 5 inches, and the young trees came up very strong indeed.

There was another point he would like to make, and that was the question of economy and economical working. He was very grateful to Mr. Vaughan for saying that the Commission were certainly trying to carry out the work as cheaply as possible; but he was still more gratified to be able to tell them that the results were quite satisfactory, that in no case, except in 1921, or in one or two exceptional areas, where they ran into an epidemic, had they had many failures. They had had, for example, a good many deaths in one planting in one year through an attack of moles. In no year, except in 1921, had they had a greater percentage of failure than 10 per cent. in any plantation established by the Commission; and he ventured to say, on the strength of the returns made to the Commission by private estates, that there was practically no planting done in the country where the proportion was so low. It was only fair to say, however, that the large planting units and mass production of plants made for cheapness. That was one point.

The other point was the question of cutting the price for felling timber. He believed Mr. Vaughan's experience had been obtained mainly in the New Forest. He could never have been in the Forest of Dean, where the timber was cut and trimmed out beautifully. There was no finer wood-cutter than the Dean wood-cutter. The sole reason for the cheap prices in the New Forest, to which Mr. Vaughan referred, was that the timber was so poor that, whatever one spent on it, one could not get another half-penny per foot for it. He had had a return made of what its probable sale price would be. For a sizeable lot like Salisbury trench, if well cut as in the Dean, 1*d.* to 2*d.* a foot extra might be obtained, but there was very little of such timber in the New Forest. Speaking generally, 1½*d.* a foot extra might be obtained for the better samples of New Forest timber, if cut as well as in the Dean; but that would include cutting back the tops slightly, as in some cases 15 to 20 per cent. were not cut back far enough. In some logs one would be losing some 15 to 20 per cent., not getting one penny extra for the timber. Notwithstanding the extra loss or extra cost of cutting, not a penny more per foot could be obtained for it. It did not mean the men earned less; they were paid less per foot because they did less work on the log.

On the question of wages, he would defy contradiction when he said that the foresters in the employ of the Commission were probably paid as well if not better than any foresters in the country. They had better prospects than foresters had ever had before, and certainly the woodmen throughout the whole of the areas that he had anything to do with were, so far as he knew, in a contented state. The Commission had definitely, for very good reasons, agreed to be bound by the agricultural wage in every district. That was only reasonable, otherwise when they were carrying out big operations in a purely agricultural district, probably, in sugar-beet districts especially, they might have drained every man from agriculture at the very time when labour was needed. That obviously would be wrong, and what they had done was this: Wherever possible they had introduced piecework rates, which enabled the men to earn a satisfactory wage, and a wage which compared very well with any wage in the district. That answered the two points raised by Mr. Vaughan, about which he really did feel a little hurt. The lecturer might, he thought, have verified his statements in that connection before including them in his Paper.

Mr. John Maughan had raised a point about Allerston. He was delighted with Allerston. The slopes were excellent and produced an excellent growth. The only reason why one could not grow timber on the top before was because of pan; they had broken the pan. He was so far satisfied with it that he wished that Mr. Maughan would induce Lord Downe to let them have more land in that particular district. It did emphasise the point which had been made, viz., that the Commissioners' areas were not always very good. Mr. Maughan was referring to land which nobody else wanted; nobody else would ever plant it. The Commission, however, were trying to do so, and they were putting to excellent use land which at that time was put to no good use at all. They were taking no land which would grow a more valuable crop than they could plant, or which would produce food. Finally, in those areas, in addition to producing trees, they were planting, he hoped, what would prove to be a contented population on the land, which would lead a healthy life, and if they were successful it would be a contribution to the well-being of the nation as a whole.

The PRESIDENT said that in putting this vote of thanks to Mr. Vaughan to the meeting he would like to add his thanks and congratulations. It had resulted in a very useful discussion. It had brought together numbers of what they might almost call the forestry profession, who were fully acquainted with the knowledge of the subject. Afforestation was an enormous task to face, but he was perfectly convinced that it would never have been done by private owners. Private ownership lacked continuity of management as well as funds, and that was where the Forestry Commission could, and did, fulfil a pressing need. He was very glad, therefore, that Lord Clinton and Sir George Courthope, as members of the Commission, had been present that night, and would assure them that they would have all the assistance that The Institution could afford.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried with great enthusiasm.

Mr. VAUGHAN having briefly replied, the meeting then terminated.

From the author (Mr. H. J. VAUGHAN)—

The main object of my Paper was to explain in some measure the part which the timber merchant must play in the shaping of a forestry programme, and to point out some of the factors—such as the cost of conversion and waste in conversion—which he must take into account in dealing with his purchases of timber. References to the work of the Forestry Commission in Great Britain were really subsidiary to the main theme of the Paper. Yet though so little space was devoted to the Commission, most of the interest in the discussion appears to have centred round this one point. So it is now desirable to elaborate more fully the views originally put forward.

The doubt which I expressed on the world shortage, or famine of softwoods was partly based on a conversation held 18 months ago with an eminent professor of forestry, who is, I believe, generally acknowledged to possess as wide a knowledge of the timber resources of the Empire as any man. I questioned the possibility of making any reliable estimate of the acreage under timber and the density of stocking in the world, and was moved to do so by an estimate put forward at a meeting of the British Association shortly before, to the effect that there were a million million cubic feet of timber left in the world. The professor agreed with me that the statistics on which the estimates are founded must be largely a matter of guesswork and subject to all the caprices of individual judgment. For in the great and as yet largely unexplored forest tracts of the New World, and of Russia, it is only by means of aeroplane surveys that the forest can be viewed, and the surveys are bound to be somewhat cursory.

One further point at the back of my mind, though I did not put it forward in the Paper, was the chance that with the advancement of scientific discoveries and research it was perfectly possible that efficient and cheaper substitutes would in the near future be found for softwood timber and so reduce the demand.

I would point out, however, that the doubts which I expressed as to the future softwood famine were couched in extremely reserved terms, so my critics are hardly justified in making too much play with them. I am still, as I always have been, fully conscious of the fact that owing, amongst other things, to the wasteful methods of conversion, forest fires, &c., the consumption of coniferous timber is proceeding at an alarming pace, and the rate at which depletion of forests is overtaking restocking by natural or cultural means gives grave cause for alarm.

The subject opened up by the suggestion that the Commission should devote more attention to the replanting of felled and at present waste areas, rather than to the afforestation of land not previously under trees, is such a large one that it is impossible to deal with it adequately here, since in great measure it affects the whole general policy of the Commission. The original cause of the trouble probably is that under the Acland Committee's Report a ten-years period was fixed for the first grant to the Commission. As a result a natural desire was felt to justify its existence in the eye of the general public by being able to show at the end of its first decade a certain fixed area planted, in fact to give the public a definite achievement to ensure further grants. The idea of a well-considered and continuous estate forest policy, such as obtains in several Continental countries, is here so new that it was probably inevitable, as Lord Clinton says, "that the first years of the "Forestry Commission should be something in the nature "of an experiment."

But it should now be possible to modify the procedure of the last ten years, and concentrate, not so much on the purchase or hiring on long lease of fresh areas, but on the improvement of our existing woods. This might well be done by a system of loans rather than grants to private owners bearing interest, and with the capital guaranteed by some mortgagee on the growing crop, such as, I understand, obtains in certain districts of France. If these loans were made, it would, of course, be necessary for the local officers of the Commission to take part in the planning and supervision of the work of re-afforestation as it went forward. I would suggest that in this improvement of existing woods special attention should be given to methods of natural regeneration—notably with oak and beech—as advocated by Sir George Courthope. But in order that natural seeding should succeed, rabbits must first be destroyed or wired out. Under a system of State loans with a certain measure of State supervision the difficulty of a Government dealing with areas would be largely overcome, as the labour would be done by ordinary estate woodmen living on the spot, and there would be no such need for centralisation in large blocks as there is under the present system of State purchase.

The whole question is of necessity involved with the changing system of land tenure, and it would be more difficult to carry the system of loans into proper effect with a number of occupying owners rather than with a few large owners. Yet this very difficulty makes the evolution of the commission of some scheme for dealing with our felled woodlands more urgent: for small owners who look at their land entirely from the point of view of what they can get out of it will be less likely than the old race of landlords to take any interest in the proper upkeep of their woods.

So long as the Commission's principal objective is to buy land outright, and they have a limit of £4 per acre on the capital value of the land purchased, it would be clearly a mistake further to try and grow good hardwoods on the poor soils which they will control. But I submit that—in this country, at any rate—the shortage of good hardwoods will come before that of softwoods; and it is for the Government, rather than for private owners, to forestall and meet this shortage.

In support of my contention that the Commission does not always obtain the best class of skilled workmen, I might add to the examples quoted from the New Forest one from a Crown forest at the other side of the county of Hampshire, namely, Alice Hill. When I visited that district some two years ago I have a very vivid recollection of being told by the officer in charge there that they did not find it at all easy to get good skilled labour, as they were so restricted in the rate of wages which they were allowed to pay.

Professor Pritchard's reply to the example which I gave on the fallacy of saving money by cheap rough felling amounts to a frank admission that the seller gains nothing by properly grading his produce. There may be something in this argument in the case of much of the wretched dead New Forest oak, but I beg leave to suggest that there is grave danger in the extension of such an argument to other areas. It is surely incorrect to state that by reducing the measured butt length of felled timber "one would not get one penny for the timber." For the tops would then be made up into cords with the firewood branches, and where firewood is saleable at 8s. per cord (a stack of 8 feet by 4 feet by 4 feet) this amounts to 8s. per 40 cubic feet, assuming a cord weighs 25 cwts., and it costs only 4s. or 5s. to make a cord. I still contend that even for second-grade timber a substantially better price would be realised if it is properly felled and trimmed, and I feel that all experienced merchants will agree with me.

I might add that I personally know of many first-class timber fellers in the New Forest district who are working for merchants and not for the Commission.

In advocating the planting of ash I would repeat that I did not do so in an indiscriminate way, and on page 155 in the February Journal it will be seen that I recommended it only wherever there is a natural growth of ash with fine smooth bark and other indications of good internal quality.

Mr. Leslie Wood still inclines to accept it as a "proper rule" that the forester's objective should be to grow the maximum amount of timber in the shortest time. This view appears to imply a failure to recognise the cost of extraction as one of the most important factors affecting the value of a stand of timber. Yet it may well be that in a remote and difficult situation the cost of getting cut small lots of timber may make them worth almost nothing. One example from my own experience will prove this point: About 40,000 cubic feet of spruce were bought in one of the southern counties at an extremely low price—only about $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ per foot, and as it could be got rid of in no other way to show any profit, was sold as pitwood. It stood some way from a hard road and eight miles from a station, and by the time that felling, cross-cutting into the required lengths, tushing with horses to the roadside, carriage by lorry to station and rail freight to the mine had been paid, it left no appreciable profit to the merchant. On this particular soil, oak, ash and beech would probably have done well, but the spruce gave a heavier crop per acre than they would have yielded in the same time.

The foresters' object should be to grow that sort of timber which will give him the biggest profit and not the biggest yield per acre. No farmer thinks it necessarily best to get the highest yield in crop and stock per acre, but to concentrate on those forms of saleable produce which give him the best surplus of receipts over expenditure; and the forester is like a farmer growing trees.

Disputes and waste of time in measuring a felled parcel of timber are, I suggest, often due to ignorance of the qualities and defects in good and bad timber on the part of the vendor or his agent rather than to the inherent difficulty of the system. A price per foot with fair allowance for defects is generally agreed upon, and a speedy and amicable settlement of how much the allowance each defect warrants can be arrived at where both parties to the bargain are fair and practical men.

I regret that I have had no personal experience of valuing timber on the "basic area system" of measurement, but feel that its application must be rather difficult where a large and varied stand of timber of various sorts and sizes is being dealt with.

In answering Mr. Maughan's query about the price of softwood timber, I should add that no allowance is made for a fair profit to the merchant in the calculation which brings the outgoings per cubic foot of converted spruce to 2s. 3d. The merchant would not expect to work on a lower basis than 10 per cent. to cover profit and interest on capital, and 10 per cent. on 2s. 3d. is 2s. 7d., which means that, to obtain quite a low profit, spruce, when bought at a very low price (3d. per foot) and not in a bad situation (where the 6d. per foot haulage would be inadequate), must be sold at 2s. 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per foot. At this price it will hardly compete with a superior article from abroad.

From Mr. B. C. ADKIN (Professional Associate)—

Many of the questions raised by Mr. Vaughan's Paper were dealt with by the gentlemen who spoke after it had been read, but there are other points which seem to deserve at least a brief notice. This is not Mr. Vaughan's first essay in rural economics, for in 1924 he was awarded the gold medal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England for research work on "The Economics of Production on "Grass and Arable Farms." It was greatly to be hoped that Mr. Vaughan would see his way to write something about his experiences in a home-grown timber firm. The opportunity was too good to be missed. We have comparatively little information about the timber merchant from skilled investigators, and badly need more. Therefore this Paper is most valuable. It gives us representative figures for timber conversion and a satisfactory method for the statement and comparison of costs, all of which are reliable. The future comparative shortage of softwood timber, which is doubted in the Paper, is a subject already dealt with; but in support of the expectation it has been found that in the last forty years the real price of imported sawn and split fir, where corrections are made for fluctuations in the value of money, has increased at the average rate of .9 per cent. per annum, a rise equivalent to a doubling in price in about 77 years. It is probable that in the future British hardwoods, with the exception of ash, will not be able to compete successfully with hardwoods imported from tropical forests. The argument that "foresters should not lag behind farmers in adopting “ their schemes of production to current demands and “ prices ” is unfortunate. The forester plants for a market many years ahead ; current demands may be misleading. The farmer not only turns over his money within a few months, but has much greater control over his conditions of production. These are fundamental differences between agriculture and forestry. All foresters appreciate them, and it is strange that they are not more generally recognised.

PAPER NO. 519.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN TOWN PLANNING.

By F. Longstreth Thompson, B.Sc., A.M.Inst.C.E., M.T.P.I. (Fellow).

Institution on Monday, 4th March, 1929.*

Twenty years have now elapsed since the first of the Town Planning Acts was placed on the Statute Book, and although we have scarcely passed the threshold of the subject and are really only beginning to explore its possibilities, considerable experience has been gained of the practical application of the powers that have been granted to local authorities, and an attempt to review the progress made and the directions in which it is tending may usefully be undertaken.

It is not my purpose in this Paper either to argue the case for town planning in the abstract or to discuss the principles of what may be described as the "art" of town planning. I do not think it would be going too far to say that among those who have given the subject serious consideration both these are matters of general agreement. But even if this were not the case, Parliament has conferred town planning powers upon local authorities, and in the light of experience has extended, and is likely still further to extend, them. Town planning has, therefore, to be recognised as one of the legitimate functions of a local authority, and it is in the common interest that both the powers possessed by local authorities and the methods of their application should be well understood, and that it should be appreciated that only by co-operation between landowners and other interested parties and the public bodies responsible for the administration of the Act can the best results be obtained. It is upon these aspects of the subject, therefore, that attention can most profitably be focussed.

Perhaps the most striking development that has taken place since the Act was passed is the growing appreciation of the importance of town planning. Originally regarded as a rather dangerous piece of legislation with a distinctly socialistic flavour, the sections giving town planning powers to local authorities were somewhat grudgingly tacked on, as a kind of appendix, to a voluminous Housing Act. The powers were permissive, and during the first few years after the Act was passed neither the general public nor those more particularly interested in land, nor even the great bulk of local authorities, were really alive to the position and all that it implied. A few of the more progressive councils immediately took advantage of their new powers and initiated schemes, but it is only within the last few years that town planning in this country has begun to be taken seriously.

There is little doubt that the Great War, although it temporarily put a stop to all such activities, was directly responsible for the impetus that town planning received after its termination. It was the sudden, tremendous and widespread building activity that accompanied the efforts of the Government to make good the housing shortage that had arisen on account of the virtual cessation of building during the war that gave the need for town planning a prominence which otherwise might have taken years to achieve. When, instead of passing plans for a few buildings scattered here and there over their districts, local authorities were faced with the task of choosing sites, laying out roads, providing water, gas, electric light, and sewers and even sewage disposal works, setting apart land for open spaces and allotments, and furnishing educational facilities and often means of transport for whole colonies of new houses, it was brought home both to them and to the public that before the problems of housing could satisfactorily be solved the larger problems of town planning required the most careful consideration.

The urgency of the case became, indeed, so apparent that in 1919 an amending Act was passed with the triple object of expediting the preparation of town planning schemes, simplifying procedure, and facilitating development pending the completion of schemes. Further reference will be made later to these provisions, the point which it is desired to emphasise here being that this Act not merely removed the necessity to obtain the previous authorisation of the Local Government Board (now Ministry of Health) to the preparation of a town planning scheme (except where land is included outside the promoting authority's district), but also made it obligatory upon every borough or other urban district having a population of 20,000 or more to prepare a scheme by 1st January, 1926. It is true that the date for submission of schemes to the Minister was, in the 1923 Act, postponed until 1st January, 1929, and that it has been found necessary to postpone it still further.* But these extensions of time arise from practical difficulties in procedure rather than from any desire to countenance delay, and the fact remains that for the larger urban centres town planning is considered to be of such vital importance that in their case the preparation of a town planning scheme is no longer a matter of choice but an obligation. Moreover, as a result of the marked modern tendency towards residential decentralisation and the consequent spreading of development to areas outside the boundaries of the more populous places, a large and increasing number of the smaller authorities are realising the advantages of securing some measure of control over this development, and are accordingly making voluntary use of their powers to prepare town planning schemes. The majority of the authorities taking action is, indeed, composed of the smaller urban and rural district councils who are under no obligation in the matter.

Some indication of the progress which has been made in this direction may be gathered from the following statistics:—

* It is proposed in the Local Government Bill to extend the period by ten years.

Joint Town Planning.

The modifications introduced by the Act of 1919 included, in addition to those previously referred to, a provision enabling local authorities to act jointly in the preparation or adoption of a town planning scheme by means of a joint committee upon whom the appointing councils may confer all or any of the powers they themselves might exercise. The desirability of joint action of this nature has become increasingly apparent as town planning progressed, and extensive use has already been made of the opportunities now available. Evidence of the widespread activity in this department of town planning is furnished by the accompanying particulars of the Joint town planning committees which have been appointed:—

Italics indicate Joint Committees with executive powers which have also been conferred on 7 groups of local authorities in the Manchester region not separately mentioned in the above list.

* Reports and Plans have been published by these Joint Committees.

Joint town planning has, in practice, developed in two directions, which, although ultimately leading to the same goal, are in their earlier stages quite distinct. These may conveniently be considered under the headings of "Executive Joint Town Planning" and "Regional Planning."

Executive Joint Town Planning.

Joint town planning schemes are prepared in the same way and, when approved, have the same statutory effect as a town planning scheme promoted by a single authority for its own district. They are prepared in two ways:—

(a) By means of an executive joint committee either formed to carry out the proposals of a regional committee (e.g., the groups into which the Manchester region sub-divided, and Rotherham and Chesterfield), or appointed to prepare a joint scheme ab initio (e.g., Preston and district, the Hartlepoons, and South Oxfordshire).

- (b) By means of a scheme promoted by one authority but prepared in conjunction with an advisory joint committee representing the authorities affected (e.g., Oxford, Winchester, Taunton, and Cheltenham).

Regional planning schemes, on the other hand, are of an entirely different character. They usually represent the combination of a much larger number of local authorities, cover a considerably greater area, and—the most important distinction—they are advisory and not operative.

Regional Planning : Function and Scope.

The primary function of a regional plan is to indicate in general terms the lines upon which future development can most advantageously be guided in the interests of the region as a whole. The Joint Committee both can and should take a much wider view than is possible for any one of its constituent councils, whose outlook is necessarily centred upon the needs of its own particular area. Unhampered by the limitation of ideas imposed by local boundaries, it is free to consider the whole question of development upon a much broader basis, and to make recommendations which, if sometimes rather ambitious, at all events furnish an ideal and give coherence to the efforts made to attain it.

The common interest between the local authorities which is the main factor in determining the extent of a region varies in different cases. The Manchester and District area, for instance, comprises a group of closely related industrial towns so congested as to make the solution of their problems in connection with transport, housing and open spaces dependent upon co-ordinated action over a very extensive area. In the case of Doncaster and East

Kent it is a question largely of preparing for the development anticipated in connection with the establishment of coal mining and its attendant industries in areas hitherto almost exclusively agricultural. In such regions as North and West Middlesex the main considerations are those connected with the accommodation and transport of the dormitory population of London and the migration of industry from the central areas, both aspects of the larger problems with which the recently appointed Greater London Joint Committee is endeavouring to cope. Other regions, such as North and South Tyneside and Tees-side, are concerned with industrial development incidental to important navigable estuaries, while in a quite different category are the Lake District regions whose authorities are banded together with the main object of preserving unspoilt the natural beauty of their incomparable scenery. Despite such diverse reasons for their constitution, all these regional committees have the same object in view, namely, the investigation of the resources of the region and the working out of a scheme which, so far as can be foreseen, will ensure that they are conserved and developed to the best possible advantage for all concerned. Thus while each region possesses its individual characteristics and has its own peculiar needs, the main features of all regional plans are similar in kind, although frequently differing widely in the emphasis placed upon them. In every scheme the following matters must receive due consideration :—

- (1) Outline zoning proposals, i.e., the broad allocation of areas to the uses (industrial, business, residential, or agricultural) for which each is best suited.
- (2) General density provisions, i.e., the number of houses to the acre, which are suitable for application to the various parts of the region.
- (3) The main transport routes to be provided or improved, including the provision of aerodromes.
- (4) Building lines.
- (5) Land which it is desirable to reserve as open space.

- (6) General policy with regard to the preservation of amenity and the protection of places, buildings and objects of special beauty or historical or architectural interest.
- (7) The desirability of combined action with regard to water supply, drainage, or other public services.

Preliminary Survey and Need for Co-operation.

Before it is possible to arrive at any conclusions with regard to these matters, it is obviously necessary to make a careful survey of existing conditions and present tendencies, and to form some estimate of the nature and extent of the development that may be expected to take place in the course of the next ten or twenty years, or even longer. The detail into which it is necessary to go in such surveys will depend on the circumstances in each case. Where coal mining, for example, is an important factor, it is essential to know as accurately as possible the area of the coal field and the probable positions of the pits. In fact, as the report on the Rotherham Scheme points out: "In the "planning of a colliery area the most important conditions "affecting the plan are those found underground." Apart, however, from special considerations of this kind, it is usually found necessary to investigate—

- (1) The growth and movement of the population.
- (2) The kind of industries that have been and are being established in the region, together with the reasons for their location in particular places, and any special facilities they require.
- (3) The relationship between place of work and place of residence.
- (4) Housing requirements.
- (5) Transport conditions in connection with roads, railways, and waterways, attention being especially directed to the system of main roads, the adequacy of the available routes and their capacity to carry the traffic now using them. For this purpose statistics with regard to the nature and volume of traffic and its rate of growth are essential.

- (6) All factors such as the improvement of transport facilities, the distribution of electric power, the extension or limitation of public services, such as water supply or sewerage, the reclamation of land liable to flooding, &c., which may affect development.
- (7) The desirability and opportunities for establishing new "satellite" towns.
- (8) The larger areas which should be preserved as open spaces either from the point of view of public recreation or as places of scenic importance.
- (9) Areas which it would be generally advisable to retain as agricultural land.
- (10) Ancient monuments, old towns and villages and objects of particular architectural or historical interest that should be protected.

This is by no means an exhaustive list, but it will serve to indicate the scope of the enquiries which have to be made. In all these investigations assistance from those who have an intimate knowledge of the locality is extremely valuable, and wherever possible steps have been taken to consult representative local opinion. It is, however, manifestly impracticable to get into touch with individuals to any large extent, having regard to the magnitude of the regional areas, nor, having regard to the general (rather than detailed) character of both survey and scheme, is it usually necessary. What is desirable, on the other hand, is that the views of representative bodies, both of landowners and their advisers, should be sought with more freedom, and that the difficulties in making contact which have frequently been experienced should as far as possible be removed. In some cases failure in this direction has been due to the absence of any organisation which the Joint Committee could approach and in others to mutual ignorance of each other's existence. But whatever the reason, closer co-operation is desirable, and the efforts now being made towards this end, of which the Memorandum recently prepared by a Joint Conference representing the Central Landowners' Association, the Land Agents' Society and this Institution is an example, deserve every encouragement.

While such co-operation is desirable in the preliminary survey stage of the scheme, it is of even greater importance during the preparation of the plan. It is particularly necessary in connection with the zoning of mining districts, the location of industrial areas, and, indeed, in deciding, generally, the purpose for which land in different parts of the region is most suitable. It must, of course, be recognised that it is not always possible to reconcile the wishes of the individual with the needs of the community, and in the case, for example, of proposals involving the improvement of existing main roads or the provision of new ones, the determining factors must ultimately be topographical and financial. Too much importance should not be attached either by those responsible for the scheme or by its critics to the precise alignment of the roads or the exact boundaries of zones or open spaces on a regional plan. In so far as these proposals are shown on a map they must be defined, but the map should be treated as a necessary explanatory accompaniment to the scheme, prepared not as a working drawing, but as a general guide to local authorities in the working out of the detailed provisions of their statutory town planning schemes.

Implementation of Regional Proposals.

The appointment of these regional committees is the result of voluntary co-operation between the local authorities concerned, and the execution of their recommendations is also a matter of voluntary action on the part of the constituent councils. As a rule local authorities within a regional area are willing to co-operate in the preparation of a plan, and in the majority of cases to give effect to it by the preparation of town planning schemes. But there are instances of complete refusal to take any part in the scheme. Such an attitude is likely to be disadvantageous not only to the council concerned but also to its neighbours, whose efforts to carry out the scheme may easily be stultified thereby. The Minister has power (Section 13, Town Planning Act, 1925) to require a local authority to prepare and enforce a town planning scheme, and in default either to act himself or to empower the county council to do so. Up to the present this power has not been exercised, and the need for it is probably growing less each year as the advantages of town planning become more widely appreciated. Nevertheless, it can be invoked in the last resort.

The implementation of regional proposals, however, presents certain other practical difficulties, to overcome which is one of the most pressing problems of town planning. The difficulties mainly arise, as might be expected, on the score of finance, and they occur chiefly in connection with the reservation of large open spaces and the provision for what are rather loosely described as arterial roads. In both cases regional proposals represent a good deal more than the aggregate of purely local requirements, and both on this account, and also because the location of the open spaces and the alignment of the arterial roads are largely determined by topographical considerations without regard to local government boundaries, the question at once arises as to the apportionment of the liability for the cost likely to be incurred. Some part of it should clearly be borne by the individual local authorities who will certainly benefit, but the balance requires to be spread upon a broader basis, and some kind of regional fund is undoubtedly required. How this is to be raised is a matter yet to be decided, but in the meantime progress is being made towards a system of indemnification by county councils of local authorities in respect of approved proposals with regard to the improvement of existing main roads and the reservation of routes likely to become main roads, included in town planning schemes. Regional open spaces are more difficult to deal with because county councils, while they are highway authorities, do not generally possess powers to acquire or contribute to the acquisition of open spaces. In at least one instance, however, where this power is provided for in a local Act, the county council has recently decided to contribute up to 75 per cent. of the cost of acquiring regional open spaces in approved cases.

The proposals in the Local Government Bill, now before Parliament, to extend town planning powers to county councils, though really consequent upon the increased powers they are to receive in connection with highway administration, will, if they are properly used, go a long way towards solving the difficulties of carrying both regional and town planning schemes into execution. As town planning authorities, county councils will presumably be able to incur expenditure and levy rates for town planning purposes. Something not unlike a regional fund appears, therefore, to be in sight.

Town Planning.

Considerable space has been devoted to the subject of regional planning, because it is (or should be) the foundation of town planning in the same way that town planning should be the basis of estate development. On the assumption, therefore, that a regional plan has already been prepared, it is the function of the town planning scheme to apply in detail, over a much smaller area, the general policy recommended by the regional committee.

Powers and Land to which they apply.

The powers and duties of local authorities in connection with town planning are now contained in the Town Planning Act, 1925, which consolidates all the previous enactments relating to the subject. As has already been noted earlier in this Paper, the powers originally granted have in certain directions progressively increased. The preparation of town planning schemes is now obligatory upon all boroughs and urban districts with a population of more than 20,000 according to the census of 1921. The powers of the Minister of Health to require any local authority to prepare a scheme (when he is satisfied that this is necessary) have been strengthened by allowing him, in case of default, either himself to act or to empower the County Council to act in place of and at the expense of the local authority. The approval of the Minister is no longer required to the resolution of a local authority deciding to prepare a town planning scheme for land wholly within its area; and joint action in the preparation of schemes has now been sanctioned.

The most notable extension of powers, however, is that embodied in Section 1 (2), which permits the Minister to authorise the preparation of a scheme "prescribing the "space about buildings, or limiting the number of buildings "to be erected or prescribing the height or character of "buildings," with a view to preserving the existing character and to protecting the existing features of any locality of special architectural, historic, or artistic interest, notwithstanding that the land is already developed. Advantage has already been taken of this permission to prepare schemes for the cities of Oxford, Winchester, Exeter, and Canterbury, whose example will, no doubt, be followed by many other places with similar claims. It is to be observed that the scope of such schemes is restricted to provisions designed to protect and preserve the existing character of the locality in special circumstances. But the very fact that authority has been given to exercise a limited control implies the admission, already hinted at in Section 54 (3) of the 1909 Act, that town planning powers are required in respect of built-on areas. It is, indeed, common knowledge that official consideration is being given to this question, and it may be anticipated that the scope of the Act will be enlarged in this sense in the not distant future.

In the meantime town planning schemes are confined to "land which is in course of development or appears "likely to be used for building purposes . . . provided "that where a piece of land already built upon or a piece of "land not likely to be used for building purposes is so situate "with respect to any land likely to be used for building "purposes that the general object of the scheme would be "better secured by its inclusion," it may be included in the scheme. The present practice is to give a wide interpretation to the phrase "likely to be used for building purposes," and this is justified by the modern tendency towards decentralisation which is largely due to high rates in urban areas, and has been made possible by the remarkable improvement in facilities for cheap and rapid transport, both public and private, that has taken place in the last few years. It would be difficult, in these days, to sustain a case that any land within a range of twenty or thirty miles of a large town was not likely to be built upon. Indeed, judging by the notice boards announcing "land ripe for building" that are now to be found in the most remote and unlikely spots, landowners or their agents are liable, in some cases, to exercise a degree of foresight which they would strongly deprecate in a local authority. Side by side with this tendency towards scattered development on the outskirts is the tendency to re-develop the older and more central residential districts containing big houses with relatively large gardens. Generally speaking, therefore, in an urban district the whole area, apart from the closely built-up centre of the town, can legitimately be included in the scheme.

Contents of Town Planning Schemes.

The general object of a town planning scheme is that "of securing proper sanitary conditions, amenity and convenience in connection with the laying out and use of the land . . .," and the Minister of Health is empowered to prescribe general provisions for carrying out the general objects of town planning schemes, and in particular for dealing with the matters specified in the First Schedule to the Act. The subjects which may be dealt with are very numerous, but for the purpose of this Paper they may conveniently be condensed under the following main headings:—

- (1) Streets.—The widening, diversion, or stopping up of existing streets and the alignment, width, and construction of new streets.
- (2) Buildings.—The prescription of the character, density, height and space about buildings and of building lines.

- (3) Open Spaces.—The reservation of lands for public and private open spaces, allotments, &c.
- (4) General amenity.—Control of the design of materials used in the elevations of buildings, the preservation of trees, regulations with regard to the display of advertisements, &c.

It has not yet been considered advisable to prescribe a set of general provisions, as sufficient experience of schemes in actual operation is not available, but the Ministry of Health have issued Model Clauses for the guidance of local authorities in preparing schemes, and these, with the accompanying explanatory memorandum, indicate with precision the nature and scope of a town planning scheme under normal conditions. The careful study of the Model Clauses, or, better still, the study of an approved scheme in conjunction with its plan (copies of which are usually obtainable from the Council concerned), is without doubt the best way of obtaining a general grasp of the kind of provisions included in town planning schemes, and of the manner in which they are enforced. Some supplementary notes upon the practice adopted in connection with the principal matters dealt with may, however, be of service.

Streets.

Proposals with regard to new streets or the widening of existing streets are, as a rule, confined to the principal routes which are now or are considered likely to be required for convenient access through and about the district. It is not generally desirable that a town plan should fix the position of streets which are merely incidental to the lay-out of estates, although it is sometimes advisable, for example, when the proper development of one estate is dependent upon the position of the roads in an adjoining estate. Apart from such exceptions, however, it has been found better to leave the position of minor roads to be determined when the estate is being planned, and power to do this and to require the submission of lay-out plans for adjoining lands is reserved in the scheme.

The object of placing a new road on the town planning map is to keep the route open, to prevent anything being done on the site which would render demolitions or other expensive proceedings necessary when the time comes for the construction of the road, and to secure that the laying out of the adjoining land shall be based upon a convenient system of main thoroughfares. It does not follow that because a road is shown on the map there is any intention of the local authority itself to construct the road either immediately or in the future. Power is usually taken in the scheme to construct the road in the event of its being required for public purposes before it is needed for estate development, and in that event it is customary to provide that no frontage charges shall be made until building takes place. Subject to this, the road would be made up in the ordinary course as a private street when the land is developed, the Council being responsible for any additional expense incurred in respect of requirements exceeding those which can be demanded for private street works.

It is important to bear in mind that there is a very strong tendency in the direction of leaving the construction of the roads to be done as development actually takes place. This both postpones expenditure by the local authority until it is absolutely necessary, and avoids, to a large extent, the premature disturbance or severance of the lands affected. It is, of course, highly desirable from the point of view both of the landowners and the local authority that the main roads should be planned in such a way as, without undue interference with their direction, curves and gradients, to fit in with the economical development of the land through which they pass. Another point which should not be lost sight of is that estates should be so laid out that general traffic is concentrated upon the main routes and kept off the residential roads. Where this is done it is possible to allow a reduced width for the minor roads, and the saving thus accomplished will usually more than compensate for the additional width required for the principal roads.

Buildings : Character Zoning.

The determination of the kinds of buildings to be allowed in different parts of the area, or character zoning, is one of the most important objects of a town planning scheme, and one about which there is still a great deal to learn. The idea underlying zoning is to allocate land to the use for which it is best suited, so that industrial buildings, business premises, and houses (to take the three chief categories) shall occupy suitable positions in the general structure of the town and have room to expand without creating conditions inimical either to health, convenience, or amenity. In the practical application of this principle it has been found necessary to allow a good deal of latitude with regard to the character of buildings allowed in the different zones. The method currently adopted is to determine the predominant use (i.e., the kind of buildings which will be permitted as a matter of course), and to specify the kind of buildings which will not be permitted and those which will be permitted only with the consent of the council and on conditions imposed by them. The following examples will, perhaps, make this rather clearer:—

Zone.	Buildings which may be erected without Council's consent.	Buildings which may only be erected with Council's consent.	Buildings not to be erected.
(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)
General Residential ...	Dwelling-houses, residential buildings	Buildings other than those specified in columns (2) and (4)	Buildings for noxious trade or industry.
General Business ...	Shops and business premises, dwelling-houses, and residential buildings	Buildings other than those specified in columns (2) and (4)	Buildings for noxious trade or industry.
General Industrial ...	Buildings, other than those for noxious trade or industry	Buildings for noxious trade or industry	—

These are typical of the three kinds of zones most generally in use. It will be noted that considerable latitude is provided, more particularly in the business and industrial zones which are not restricted to these uses, but represent areas where such buildings may be erected. Both the elasticity of the zones themselves and the wide discretionary powers given to the local authority are departures from the much more rigid zoning adopted in the earlier schemes, and it is by no means certain that the merit of elasticity possessed by the present methods outweighs the advantages of stability inherent in the former policy. In so far, however, as development is much more diffuse than it used to be, it is less easy to determine with precision the exact course it will take, and from this point of view a certain degree of elasticity in zoning is essential. Moreover, it should be pointed out that powers for supplementary zoning in greater detail are provided for in the scheme with the object of stabilising the character of districts where this is obviously desirable, while as a safeguard against the misuse of their discretionary powers the local authority, before giving consent to the erection of buildings which conflict with the predominant character of any zone, are required to advertise their intention in order to give adjoining owners or other interested persons the opportunity of appealing against the proposal.

Buildings : Density Zoning.

The main purpose of restricting the density of buildings is to prevent overcrowding and promote conditions of health and amenity in residential areas. It is generally agreed that in order to satisfy these conditions the maximum density should not exceed 12 houses to the acre, and this is the standard almost universally adopted. Lower densities are, however, commonly applied to limited areas where there is evidence that there is a demand for larger plots and where it is in the interests both of the owners and of the community that the amenities belonging to a better class of development should be protected.

In prescribing the number of houses to the acre which may be erected in a particular zone, it is usual to specify an average density, which, of course, does not mean that houses will necessarily be built up to that average, but merely that they must not exceed it. Nor does it mean that in an area zoned, for example, at 4 houses to the acre, each house must be on a plot of one-quarter of an acre. So long as the average density, usually calculated over land units of 7 acres, is not exceeded, there is nothing to prevent the erection of a greater number of houses than the average on part of the land and the reservation of the remainder for larger plots or open spaces.

For the purpose of calculating the density, half the width of any road dedicated to the public which abuts on the land unit is included in the land unit, and some allowance is usually made for public open spaces given to the local authority or acquired by them on specially favourable terms after the date of the initiation of the scheme. Machinery is also provided for the submission and approval of plot plans in order that developing owners may, if they wish, have the exact number of buildings which can be erected on their land determined before the land is sold. Provisions are included for the relaxation of the prescribed density where it would be unreasonable to require compliance owing to the lay-out of streets constructed before the initiation of the scheme, or the small amount of land in the possession of the owner at that date, and power is given to the council to vary (with the approval of the Minister) the average densities permitted in the various zones if it seems to them desirable.

The method of fixing standards of building density by the prescription of an average number of building units (i.e., single family houses) per acre is not practicable in the case of other than residential buildings, and to meet this difficulty the proportion of the space within their curtilage which may be covered by buildings is also specified in the scheme. The proportion varies from one-quarter in the case of dwelling-houses of more than one storey to three-quarters in the case of single-storey buildings in which no dwelling accommodation is provided, but increases may be allowed in special circumstances such as corner sites.

Building Lines.

Building lines may either be shown on the town planning

map or they may be prescribed by the council as necessity arises. Although they have some value in keeping free from buildings land that may be required for future road widenings, the main purpose of building lines (despite the decision in the Ruislip-Northwood case) is to ensure that there is sufficient space between buildings on either side of the road to secure healthy conditions with regard to air, space, and sunlight. For two-storey buildings a distance of 70 feet between them is generally accepted as the minimum which satisfies these conditions, and for residential roads building lines are usually based upon this figure. In the case of main traffic roads, however, the majority of people, if they are so misguided as to build or occupy houses on main road frontages, adopt, in their own interest, a greater set-back, and it is usual to prescribe deeper building lines accordingly. Shops, business premises and industrial buildings are generally permitted a smaller set-back than is required for residential buildings, but great care should be taken to ensure that it is sufficient to provide for the extra width of footpath and roadway that is necessary to accommodate the additional pedestrian traffic and the stopping vehicular traffic to which such buildings give rise. For this purpose a minimum building line of 10 feet is found in practice to be suitable in most cases.

Open Spaces.

Land can be reserved for the purpose both of public and private open spaces. The former may include large natural reservations such as are often recommended in regional schemes, parks, playing fields, and allotments. The latter apply generally to golf-courses, tennis courts, and private grounds which the owner is desirous of preserving both for his own amenity and that of the neighbourhood. Areas so scheduled cannot be built upon, but are otherwise unrestricted in user until, in the case of public open spaces, they are required for public purposes. The date on or after which the land shall or may be acquired is fixed by agreement or specified in the scheme.

General Amenities.

The Model Clauses contain provisions designed to enable the local authority to prevent the ruthless destruction of trees in the area, to control the display of advertisements, and to require the abatement of serious injury to amenity caused by the neglect to maintain private open spaces and gardens in proper condition. Valuable though these powers may be, they are transcended in importance by the power to control the design of and the materials used in the elevations of buildings. Although not included in the published collection of Model Clauses, a model clause embodying this power has been drafted for use in town planning schemes. It provides for the appointment of an independent standing Advisory Committee of three members, of which one is to be a Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects, one a Fellow of The Surveyors' Institution, and one a Justice of the Peace. To this Committee are to be referred all questions with regard to the approval or otherwise of elevations that the council themselves are not prepared to approve, and the decision of the Committee is final.

It may be admitted, at once, that the introduction of public control in matters of taste has distinct elements of danger, and it is obvious that such control must be exercised with great discretion, and that the tribunal must be such as to command general confidence in its decisions. The widespread complaints with regard to the spoliation of the countryside by ill-designed buildings constructed of inappropriate materials does, however, indicate that the time is ripe to proceed further with an experiment which has been in operation in Ruislip-Northwood, for instance, for a number of years with successful results. Even if it is not found practicable to do more than prevent the erection of actual monstrosities something will have been accomplished, and in course of time it may be possible to educate public taste to the level it had attained, say, at the beginning of last century.

Compensation and Betterment.

Compensation is payable in respect of property injuriously affected by the making of a town planning scheme except as regards provisions which—

- (i.) might have been contained in bye-laws or are similar to provisions in respect of which no compensation is payable under a general or local Act of Parliament ;
- (ii.) prescribe the space about buildings ;
- (iii.) limit the number of buildings to be erected ;
- (iv.) prescribe the height of buildings ;
- (v.) prescribe the character of buildings.

Betterment, on the other hand, may be claimed by a local authority to the extent of half of any consequent increase in the value of property.

Claims for compensation and betterment must be made within the period (usually 12 months from the date of the approval of the scheme) specified in the scheme, except in cases where the provisions of the scheme confer powers on the local authority, claims arising out of the exercise of which could not reasonably be expected to be determined until the powers are actually exercised, when the period runs from the date on which the council give notice of the exercise of or intention to exercise such power or, where an appeal lies and is made to the Minister, from the date on which the claimant is notified of the Minister's decision.

Questions in dispute relating to compensation or betterment are determined, unless the parties otherwise agree, by the arbitration of one of the official arbitrators appointed under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919.

The extent to which claims for compensation arise from the making of a scheme depend very largely on the extent to which there has been co-operation between the local authority and the owners. There is no doubt that a carefully prepared plan operates to the advantage of owners in general as well as to the community ; and if the representatives of each do their best to meet the reasonable wishes of the other, it is usually possible at least to strike a balance, on the whole transaction, between the improvement and the depreciation in the value of property caused by the scheme. This contention has so far been borne out by actual experience.

Opportunities for Representation and Objection.

The regulations governing the procedure to be adopted in the preparation of a town planning scheme provide ample opportunities at each stage for persons affected by the scheme to make such representations or objections as they deem to be necessary, both to the local authority and to the Ministry of Health. But apart from formal opportunities of this kind, there is unlimited scope for informal consultation between the parties; and local authorities have been urged to avail themselves of the advantages of frank discussion of their proposals with estate owners and their representatives, especially in the early stages and before the proposals take too definite a shape. While local authorities are willing and anxious to follow this advice, there are practical difficulties in the way of establishing contact. There is usually, for example, no complete or readily accessible reference of owners, and although this has to be prepared in the later stages of the scheme, it is a costly matter and one which local authorities are unwilling to undertake (in view of subsequent changes in ownership necessitating complete revision) until it becomes imperative. It is not until the draft scheme stage that notices are sent to individual owners; in the preliminary stages notification is effected by means of advertisements in local newspapers. It is therefore necessary that owners and their agents should keep a watchful eye upon public notices in the local press, and it would be to their advantage, and would also greatly facilitate the means of co-operation, if they were to take immediate steps to register their names and ownerships with the request, which would readily be acceded to, that they should be informed of any proposals under consideration in regard to their land.

Development pending the Completion of a Scheme.

In order to remove as far as possible any obstacle to development that might be caused either by delay in the preparation or by uncertainty with regard to the ultimate provisions of a town planning scheme, the Minister of Health issued in 1922 a General Interim Development

Order, empowering local authorities to permit development on compliance with any reasonable requirements they may impose, pending the preparation and approval of a scheme. Any person who proposes to erect buildings on land included in a town planning scheme should, therefore, apply to the local authority for a permit if he wishes to be protected against the risk of subsequent interference with his development. It should be noted in this connection that any buildings or works undertaken after the council's resolution to prepare a scheme without such a permit may be pulled down, removed or altered without compensation if they contravene the scheme as finally approved.

Conclusion.

The attempt has been made in the foregoing paragraphs to describe current practice with regard to the application of some of the more important principles of town planning under existing powers. It has been pointed out that the subject is still relatively in its infancy, but it is gradually passing out of the experimental stage, and the directions in which it is tending to develop are becoming more clearly defined. There is, for example, a consensus of opinion amongst those engaged in administering the Act that town planning powers should be extended to built-upon areas. This is an intensive development; an extensive development which, I submit, is no less certain to take place although it will take longer to mature, is the enlargement of the scope of town planning to what will eventually become "national" planning in the sense that general policy with regard to transport, decentralisation and the establishment of new towns, and the economic use of land and other natural resources will be settled on a national rather than a regional, or even a parochial, basis as at present. These are, I believe, the chief directions in which town planning is likely to progress, but there are many problems to be solved before the necessary powers or the most suitable machinery for applying them can be determined, and, in the meantime, there is much to be learnt about and much to be done by the exercise of the powers that are already available.

A DISCUSSION took place on RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN TOWN PLANNING.

Mr. C. HERBERT BEDELLS (Senior Vice-President) in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN said he was sure the members would be sorry to hear that the President was not able to be present that night, having succumbed to the present fashionable complaint. He had been ill for the last week with an attack of influenza. The last report, however, was that his health was satisfactory. He believed Mr. Fisher's illness was attributable to the fidelity with which he carried out his duties as President of The Institution, and that members would wish the Secretary to convey to him their regret at his enforced absence.

Mr. SYDNEY A. KELLY (Member of Council) proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Thompson for his very comprehensive and excellent Paper.

In dealing with the post-war housing activity, most surveyors regretted that town planning powers had not been in sufficient operation to control some of those developments which had taken place at that period. If they had been so in operation, something better might have been seen in the way of lay-outs and of preservation of amenities and open spaces. Speaking for his own city of Liverpool, he very much regretted that there had been no town planning scheme in existence at that time. If it had not been that Liverpool had its Queen's Drive and several big arterial roads, he did not know how the housing schemes of Liverpool, totalling some 20,000 houses, would have been carried out.

There was, at the moment, an increasing interest in town planning, particularly in rural districts, which were not the districts contemplated when promoting the original Town Planning Acts. But the rural district of to-day was the urban district of to-morrow, and fortunately rural districts, in many cases, had courage enough to promote town planning schemes on their own initiative. In many rural districts, however, a penny rate only produced something under £100, and their powers were very limited. All must be thankful, therefore, that the present Local Government Bill, which would shortly become an Act, would aid those rural districts in preserving their amenities.

Mr. Thompson had dealt very well with the two subjects of joint town planning and regional planning—joint town planning with executive powers, and regional town planning with what might be called suggestive powers. Mr. Thompson had ably expressed the value of regional town planning, not only in districts which were concerned with the coal-mining industry and various other industries, but also in those districts which everyone loved and looked upon as the nation's playgrounds, such as North Wales and the Lake District. He was certain that none of the members, in whatever sphere of the profession they acted, desired the spoliation of those playgrounds, which might very well be called the natural assets of the country.

Mr. Thompson had given as one of his headings "The Preliminary Survey." No town planning scheme was of any use, either for town or for country, without such a survey. In the town a civic survey was required; in the country a regional survey was wanted, so that the whole of the interests might be co-ordinated, and so that whatever amenities the town possessed might be preserved and its architectural and archæological features retained; and with regard to the country, that beauty spots and places of interest might be maintained.

In the comprehensive list which Mr. Thompson gave on page 202 there was just one minor omission; there should be provision made for aeroplanes. He thought Mr. Thompson would agree that, for any town of 20,000 inhabitants and over, provision must be made for landing and taking off places for those who were going to fly.

One difficulty which was found in regard to rural planning was the preservation of large agricultural areas. It was not so much a difficulty where there were limited ownerships, but it was very much of a difficulty when large agricultural estates came into the market and were split up. It was to be hoped that some solution would be found for the zoning of large agricultural areas so as to prevent the ribbon development which was going on so fast. One knew that many people who had bought their farms in the past—say, seven or eight years ago—were anxious to recoup some of their expenditure, if they could, by selling the building frontages to the roads; but everyone present knew of the disadvantage of that ribbon development, and were anxious to see it replaced by the satellite town system.

Mr. Thompson had touched on the subject of built-up areas in the extension of powers of town planning. That this development was on its way was shown by the fact that some towns already had Acts of Parliament giving them power to deal with central areas as well as their unbuilt-on fringes. He desired most cordially to congratulate Mr. Thompson on his Paper, and to move that the thanks of those present be given him for presenting it.

Sir BANISTER FLETCHER (Fellow) (Chairman, Greater London Regional Town Planning Committee) said it gave him great pleasure to second the vote of thanks to Mr. Thompson for his Paper. Particularly did it give him pleasure to do so, because as chairman of the Greater London Regional Town Planning Committee he had been brought in contact with Mr. Thompson's work; and he was glad to say that that Committee had been able to retain Mr. Thompson's services in order to advise them in the development of Greater London. As was known, Dr. Raymond Unwin had been appointed by the Committee as its technical adviser, and he would be responsible for that great work which the Committee had in hand; but in addition to that, the Committee had taken precautions. They had every confidence in Dr. Unwin, but they thought, in such a great matter as the development of 2,000 square miles round London, they were justified in letting Dr. Unwin have the best available assistance. Therefore they had appointed adjunct advisers, if he might call them so. Professor Adshead, who was well known by those present, Mr. W. R. Davidge, who was also well known and who had done so much in the way of town planning, Mr. Thompson, and Mr. Frank Hunt, the valuer to the London County Council, had been asked to act as the four adjunct advisers. Therefore it would be seen that the Committee were looking at the great work which they had in hand, which had been started by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, with a strong sense of the enormous responsibility which it involved.

There was very little which he could add to what Mr. Thompson had put before the meeting. The Paper was a very illuminating one. It brought the principles of town planning right up to date, and would be read in the Journal by the many thousand members of The Institution in all parts of England.

He had been much interested to hear what Mr. Thompson had said about the Local Government Bill of 1928, and agreed with him that it would do much to forward the interests of regional and town planning in this country. The appointment of larger bodies like the County Council's, and so on, would give a stimulus to the movement.

There was one point on which he felt very strongly, and he expected he had every member with him—and that was ribbon development. It seemed to him as he motored about in his small car and saw the monstrosities which were being built on each side of the country's magnificent roads, which he and those present paid for, that they were not getting value for their money, and so strongly did the Greater London Regional Planning Committee believe in that idea, that they were going to take a deputation to Mr. Neville Chamberlain to ask him that in any future schemes (and, if there was any money left, for past schemes also), when a great road was built at the public expense, means should be taken to see that the buildings, petrol stations, and the other erections which were built on the sides of the roads, should be under public supervision, so that the waste of beauty, if he might put it so, which was now going on throughout the country might be stopped for ever.

The Council for the Preservation of Rural England was doing a great deal to awaken public interest in the matter, and he thought that if the Government could be persuaded to buy the land on either side and let it out under proper control, it would not only be a paying proposition but would be for the benefit of the community at large.

Mr. Thompson had referred to the question of how owners of estates looked at the matter of town planning. He had always found when talking to an owner of an estate about town planning, that that owner immediately became nervous. The great thing that surveyors had to impress upon their clients was that there was nothing to be frightened about. Personally he maintained that the owner of an estate had everything to gain by having a proper town plan of his district. It enabled him to deal with his estate, and it ensured for all time that it would be dealt with in the best possible way, not only for the community, but for himself. That point, therefore, he thought, was a very important one to instil.

There was only one other point to which he desired to refer, and that was the extension of town planning to built-up areas. He had always understood that the present Government were contemplating legislation for that purpose, but he fancied that it would have to be dealt with in a very careful manner. In spite of the fact that people had been told by a Minister of the Crown that in the twentieth century there was no liberty left to anyone, they must be careful how they dealt with property-owners. They must see that proper notice and proper apportionments were made when dealing with a built-up area, otherwise there might be a good deal of injustice done.

It had given him great pleasure to be present that night, and he congratulated Mr. Thompson on having produced a very excellent Paper. It gave him very great pleasure to second the vote of thanks.

Mr. G. L. PEPLER (Fellow), in supporting the vote of thanks, referred to the important part which Mr. Thompson and other members of The Institution were playing in connection with town and regional planning, whether acting for the landowner or the local authority. They were on one side of the fence or other, but he was in the happy position of sitting on it. That brought him to the point which he thought he was right in emphasising, namely, the importance of the surveyor; an importance which they seemed scarcely to realise. After all, the surveyor was the man who was charged with advising and dealing with land. If they reflected that all human activity was based on land, they would see how great the influence a surveyor was on the destiny of the place where he lived or where he did his work.

Mr. Thompson had suggested that the great impetus to town planning had come at the end of the war, when an enormous amount of State-aided housing had been undertaken. It was interesting, perhaps, to remember that undoubtedly the Act of 1909—the first Housing and Town Planning Act—had been produced by housing reformers who had seen that the questions of housing and of slum clearances could not be dealt with on a piecemeal basis, but had to be dealt with as part of a general plan. Since then, however, things had changed, and personally he would say that town planning no longer rested primarily on a housing basis. In 1909 there had been 100,000 motor-cars in England. To-day there were over two million. In 1909 aviation was in its infancy. In 1909 there had been none of the present vast schemes for spreading cheap electricity over the country. Just those three factors showed the new problems which had arisen, and which had to be dealt with in connection with town planning. The increase of road traffic and aviation, and the distribution of electricity all over the country, all brought problems in the development of towns and countryside, which needed the very greatest care and thought if a satisfactory solution were to be arrived at. That, he suggested, had changed very much the original basis of town planning.

It was his duty to travel up and down the country a good deal and to meet the members of local authorities, officials, owners of land and their surveyors, and it was pleasant to note the growing tendency of co-operation and of consultation. That was a matter on which the Ministry of Health had laid a good deal of stress.

It was very interesting to notice the evolution taking place in the matter of regional planning. When it had first been made possible in 1919, it had begun almost entirely in the big industrial centres. As a matter of fact, the first regional scheme had been conceived for the new South Yorkshire Coalfield. If one looked at the map of England, it would be seen that these Joint Committees, which now covered more than one-quarter of the country, embraced practically the whole of the industrial areas. Obviously what had been in the minds of the people who had first embarked on those schemes had been to deal with new developments which were pressing upon them. Recently the tendency had been to extend that method to rural areas. As Mr. Thompson had stated, there were regions in North Wales and in the Lake District, and recently a new committee had been set up for the Wye Valley. There were several other examples. The people who had called those conferences—in several cases the county council—were alarmed at the destruction of rural amenity which was taking place. That was what was calling joint action into being. It would be seen it was a different motive altogether from that which had impelled the earlier committees, and he thought it was a kind of motive which appealed very much to the members of The Institution.

He had very much pleasure in supporting the vote of thanks.

Mr. W. R. DAVIDGE (Fellow) said he was certain the members had appreciated the Paper very much indeed, and he felt sure also that they had appreciated the remarks which had fallen from Mr. Pepler. The country owed a good deal to Mr. Pepler: he had done more for town planning up and down the country, and more for the proper development of the country and the countryside, than any other Government official anywhere.

He agreed with a great deal of what Mr. Pepler had said about the influence of the surveyor. It was noteworthy that surveyors, whether acting for public authorities or for private landowners, were one and all nowadays imbued with the spirit of co-operation, and in seeing how far, consistent with doing their best for their own clients, they could help forward something which everybody recognised was for the general good. Personally he had experienced a great deal of co-operation from members of The Institution in all branches of the profession in every part of the country, and he desired to testify to that fact.

A good deal could be said, of course, about town planning. Mr. Thompson had touched upon built-up areas. Personally he thought the Ministry's legal advisers were wrong in saying that land which was in course of development, or likely to be used for building purposes, would include such places as those areas surrounding the West End squares, which were certainly in course of development or likely to be used for building purposes. Personally he thought a good deal could have been done by the actual application of the present Act to those particular areas.

Those who had had dealings with land in towns would realise the immense difficulties there were in any system of planning or re-planning particular areas. Those who were agents for large estates would know the power they had when representing the landowner of a big area. It was quite obvious that no complete system of planning could be done unless the interests were somehow or other pooled. It was quite obvious that one could not talk or think even of expropriating ownerships, but some system of the division of profits resulting from the operations of a town planning scheme would undoubtedly have to be brought into effect when built-up areas came to be dealt with. They could not be dealt with as separate parcels, but had to be thought of as so much land put into the scheme and re-divided after the application of the scheme, so that each person would get a share of the profits. Something of that sort would undoubtedly have to be in any scheme for dealing with built-up areas. However it was dealt with, it must be considered as a whole.

He thought Mr. Thompson might perhaps have made a little more of the need for starting town planning from a national point of view. We began, as we always began in this country, parochially when we ought to have started at the other end. We ought first to have had a national survey, then to have descended to the regional survey, and so down to the towns. None the less, it was all-important for those who were considering regional surveys to think of their subject not only from the point of view of the region, but from the point of view of the largest possible area—the whole community likely to be affected. This country, although it was in some ways in a difficult position, was still one of the richest in potentialities, and they were great indeed. It was essential, however, that those things which were worth conserving should be conserved and extended, and that the necessary expansion of industry, and of amenity also, should be provided for. After all, the amenities of to-day, many of them, were due to the surveyors of the past, who, acting on behalf of some landed proprietor, had in their wisdom planted the hilltops and flooded the valleys, and had thereby achieved something in the way of landscape development which played so great a part in this country's charm. The surveyors of the present day had the opportunity not only of preserving those amenities, or a good many of them, but of extending them. The keystone of the matter, so far as the profession was concerned, was co-operation between the surveyors on both sides of the fence. Co-operation between the surveyors representing the landowners and those representing the local authorities would achieve more than any mere Act of Parliament.

Mr. EDWARD WILLIS (Fellow) felt it was a great advantage to The Institution, especially to the younger members, that a member like Mr. Thompson should have placed a record of his knowledge and experience in the Transactions of The Institution. Mr. Thompson had put together the leading points in the four Acts of Parliament primarily governing town planning in this country, and when one saw it in that form it did seem a calamity that only an average of two schemes per annum had actually been approved by the Ministry of Health during the last fourteen years. He could not help feeling with Mr. Thompson that we had really begun at the wrong end. Town planning was essential, but he felt that national planning, particularly in regard to transport, was more important still, as we were all members of a nation before we were individuals, and before we were parishioners, if he might put it so.

Regional planning had started to help national planning. Regional planning seemed to him to be the via media between national and town planning. Executive regional planning was probably going entirely to eliminate the detailed town planning by separate local authorities. That brought him to the remarks with which Mr. Pepler had opened his observations when he had spoken of surveyors being on either side of the fence. The local authorities' surveyor was in the worst position, because he was the butt of everybody. If anything went wrong he got the blame, while receiving very little of the credit which was undoubtedly his due.

In many of the large cities and towns there were surveyors and engineers of broad views who were carrying out their duties in a manner second to none. In the smaller districts it was less likely that the local authorities' surveyors had had the opportunity of gaining the necessary experience, and in such cases it was usual to call in a consultant like his friend Mr. Thompson. As Mr. Pepler had said, every local surveyor was anxious to help, and had the interests of his district at heart. He was always out to give the necessary assistance to the consultant, and to incur a good deal of extra labour in providing most of the surveys and maps. He hoped that all consultants would recognise those facts and associate themselves with the appreciation of surveyors' services which had been expressed that night.

There were one or two points in particular in the Paper on which he would like to dwell. Mr. Thompson had dealt with the reclamation of land, which was undoubtedly one of the many important matters in town planning. He would like to throw out a note of warning in that matter. He was the chairman of the committee for the north-west of the county of London dealing with the flooding which had occurred in the River Thames in January, 1928. From a careful analysis of the levels of the floods at that time it was palpable that if the river had been in full flood, and the banks had been made secure by reclaiming land, there would have been much more serious flooding. In dealing with land reclamation one had to consider not only the benefit of reclaiming the land, but, where one was working along rivers, and even the tributaries of rivers, one had to bear in mind that, in the time of floods or abnormally high tides with tidal rivers, it was often desirable to have areas which could be flooded without doing any actual harm. Even now it was not being proposed at the present moment materially to increase the height of the banks of the Thames, and he did not think they would be materially round London.

Turning to the relations between landowners and local authorities in connection with town planning, it could be said that the question was largely one of time and finance. Immediately a scheme had been approved the question of compensation became a very serious one, especially to the smaller authorities. Now, providing the scheme was not definitely approved, but the original resolution had been passed, one could carry on, getting most of what one required done (except with an occasional appeal possibly to the Ministry of Health), and as a rule one could effect better arrangements with the landowners if they were in a hurry to proceed. In several cases he would have had to pay for the land if the scheme had been in actual practice, whereas the landowners had given him a large quantity of land for widening without any serious trouble. That was for the benefit of the ratepayers, and possibly in the long run to the benefit of the landowners themselves. It was a fact which one had to remember, and it was a reason, he thought, why a number of the schemes had not been finally approved. He knew he had many friends on the other side of the fence, but incidentally it was for the landowners to hurry the local authorities.

The only other point he desired to refer to was that of built-up areas. He had been pressing for that ever since the Town Planning Act had been passed, because he had had to face the difficulties arising from the lack of power to deal with those cases. One forbade the erection of factories, or industrial development, in one part of a district, but industries which intended to come there would immediately buy up unrestricted property and develop it, thereby damning the whole of the surrounding neighbourhood. That was actually occurring in many places, and he thought the Minister, when a deputation had appeared before him some time ago, had realised that it was really necessary, but that the only question was the extent to which detailed town planning was necessary in built areas. There it would only require to be a minor form of town planning, simply for the preservation and protection of amenities—which owners had not got at the present time.

Mr. W. TOWNEND (Fellow) said he desired to say a word or two from the point of view of the unfortunate landowner. If the members looked at the table on page 197 of the Paper they would find that there were probably three million acres in this country which were subject to schemes which had been prepared and not finally approved. The members had heard what the last speaker had said, and they had heard what Sir Banister Fletcher had said, that owners had nothing to be afraid of. They had also heard that the town planner, not wishing to let the poor unfortunate owner have his chance of getting compensation, held off the final approval of a scheme until the last possible moment. What a dreadful picture it was, twenty-eight schemes approved where owners could claim compensation, out of 647 schemes in preparation; still it was said that owners had nothing to be afraid of! Taking a town planning scheme in a developed area, Newcastle-on-Tyne, the city from which he came, had got the sanction of Parliament to town plan the developed area of the city. What had been the consequence? They had prepared a scheme. The first plan had been prepared. Owners had wished to develop their properties, and had deposited plans. The Corporation had refused to pass the plans. Then permission had been asked to develop under Interim Development Orders. That had been refused. The owners appealed to the Minister of Health, and Mr. Pepler came down. He also said "the owners have nothing what-ever to be afraid of; they will be fairly treated." He told the Corporation to meet the petitioners and come to an agreement with them, and said "I will give you a month "in which to do this, and will adjourn the Inquiry." The Corporation had made tentative suggestions, and two cases had been settled. Then the matter had gone to the City Council, who said "Oh no, this is far too expensive." It therefore became necessary to continue the Inquiry. Mr. Pepler had gone down again and had said "Now, Mr. Corporation, you are not acting at all fairly. You must either "buy or agree to refer to arbitration within a month, or we "will give the owners sanction to build."

The Corporation had waited until the twenty-ninth day of the thirty days which Mr. Pepler had given them, and then they had said "Oh, we will alter the scheme." Yet the previous speakers said "Owners had nothing whatever to "be afraid of." The only thing which the Corporation could be mulcted in was the cost of the Ministry of Health's Inquiry. The owners had the whole of their out-of-pocket expenses to pay. Surely that was something to be afraid of. There were far too many schemes being imposed on owners at the present time, and the attitude—as it seemed to him, the almost flippant attitude—of some of the speakers that night in impressing on the meeting how the payment of compensation could be avoided, compensation which was legitimately due to owners, was a scandal, and was one which should not be permitted to continue. In any future legislation in connection with town planning he did think that some provision ought to be made by which an owner could recover his costs if he succeeded against the local authority in connection with an Interim Development Order. Until that was done, the injustices which existed at the present time would persist. Last month a Ministry of Health Inquiry was held because one committee of the Leeds Corporation had refused to give permission to an owner to put up coke ovens on land which was zoned for the purpose of offensive trades. Another committee of the same Corporation was at the same time threatening to sue him if he did not deliver gas to their gasworks from those coke ovens which the first committee of the Corporation would not allow him to put up.

Yet it was said that owners had nothing whatever to be afraid of. Town planning was a beautiful theory; it was like Dr. Addison's housing scheme. But in many cases it inflicted serious hardships and failed to fulfil the ideals of those who advocated its extension.

Mr. F. W. BROCK (Fellow) mentioned that nothing had been said about the good example set by some of the large estates in the provinces on which modern seaside towns had grown and developed. The idea of town planning was not entirely new. Some of the older towns, not perhaps completely, but in portions, were well laid out. At one time he used to live in Eastbourne, which had been largely developed by the Duke of Devonshire, and to his mind, as a resident and as a visitor since, Eastbourne had been laid out on very comprehensive lines, and, generally speaking, it was a town of which the residents had reason to be very proud.

The CHAIRMAN, in putting the vote of thanks to the meeting, said it was clear from the Paper, and also from the discussion, that the subject was one which would interest all the members of The Institution more and more as time went on; with this in view the Council had arranged for the benefit of those concerned with town planning schemes that particulars and plans of effective schemes, as finally passed by the Minister of Health, would be kept at The Institution, so that they could be consulted by those who had special problems to consider. He believed that already they were in sight of one or two sets of the plans which had been accepted and which would be worked to, and he thought they would form a very good basis on which members might form their judgment as to schemes when they came before them.

The great problem in his mind was with regard to the application of town planning regulations to "built-up" areas, and he thought a good deal more water must flow under the bridges before they saw a scheme which could be carried out with equity so far as existing interests were concerned. As

Mr. Kelly said, the difficulty was to decide upon the area in which such a scheme could properly function, because the moment one got a town planning scheme which put disability on the development of land, one put a drag on that property as compared with the property which immediately surrounded it. The members were all very glad that they had heard both sides of the question that night, and he had great pleasure in putting the vote of thanks to the members.

The vote of thanks was then carried with acclamation.

Mr. THOMPSON thanked the members very much for the kind way in which they had received the Paper. It had, in spite of its many omissions, given rise to a most interesting discussion, and he hoped the members had benefited half as much as he had himself. The various speakers had made some valuable contributions to the discussion from many and distinct points of view. What had been said needed no comment from him except, perhaps, Mr. Townend's observations. Mr. Townend seemed to have had very great difficulties in Newcastle. Personally he knew nothing of the circumstances there, but he thought the real point was that one had to judge the working of the Act as a whole, and the fact that very few appeals had actually been made, in relation to the number of schemes promoted, was evidence that owners and authorities had been working satisfactorily together. He thought Mr. Townend's remarks did not show anything very wrong with town planning, but rather that the people of Newcastle were a somewhat cantankerous lot!

The meeting then terminated.

PAPER 520.

THE EDUCATION OF THE YOUNG SURVEYOR.

By B. W. Adkin (Fellow),

Principal of the College of Estate Management.

To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors' Institution on Monday, 8th April, 1929.

Introduction.

The subject upon which I have the honour to address you has ever been a weighty consideration for the older members of this Institution. How can we, the older members, do our best for the young men who enter the profession? How can we ensure that these young men shall not only carry on the high traditions of this profession, but also endeavour to raise its status? How can we order the education of these young men to fit them for the responsibilities of their professional career, so that they may work to the increasing benefit of the public and the maintenance of the honour of the profession? This Institution looks to the younger generation for its future position in the affairs of the nation. The importance of the education of the younger generation cannot be overestimated.

The Surveyors' Institution and Education.

The Surveyors' Institution, which was established in 1868 by a small number of eminent men who, at that time, were the leading members of the profession, has now become a large and influential body with a total membership of over 7,000 persons. The avowed objects of The Institution are to secure the advancement and facilitate the acquisition of that knowledge which constitutes the profession of a surveyor, to promote the general interests of the profession, and to maintain and extend its usefulness for the public advantage. The Institution has ever been most zealous in the matter of the education of the younger members, and it is to The Surveyors' Institution that all members of the profession look for the advancement of such education.

When The Institution received its Royal Charter in 1881, a system of examination was set up for the admission of students and for admission to the status of Professional Associate and Fellow. The examination for Professional Associates was made compulsory in 1886, and that for the Fellowship in 1891. The Preliminary Examination for the admission of students who had not passed an exempting examination became compulsory in 1928. By this means it has been assured that no one can become a Professional Member of The Institution unless he can prove a sufficiency of scholastic knowledge and has passed the professional examinations.

When the examination system was first started, the Council of The Institution divided the selected subjects for examination into three groups suited to the various branches of the profession, namely, the Land Agency, Valuation, and Building Sub-Divisions. The Mining Sub-Division was added later. The subjects originally chosen were undoubtedly a most admirable selection, and it is remarkable how little alteration has been necessary notwithstanding the passing of nearly fifty years. The Council has also established scholarships at the Universities for promising students.

The Benefits derived from the Professional Examinations.

Long before The Institution was founded, and for several years after its foundation, the young surveyor received his professional education solely by serving a period of apprenticeship or its equivalent. During the period of service the master taught his pupil the practice of his profession. At the end of his articles the young man generally acted as an assistant for a period of sufficient length, and could then be regarded as reasonably equipped to act as an able and practical surveyor. This method of education, probably the best which could be devised, had some drawbacks. Progress was slow, and the professional knowledge acquired by the pupil was in most cases limited to his experience of the kind of practice which was carried on in the office in which he served. Such experience was in many cases not sufficiently comprehensive, as the pupil too often found to his cost when he subsequently started to practise on his own account, and was called upon to deal in practice with matters of which he had acquired little or no knowledge as a pupil. Many a surveyor in practice must have wished that he had given more time to studying the theory of his profession during his period of pupilage, and it may well have been a matter of regret to him that in his youth there had been no incentive thus to amplify the somewhat limited experience gained by him in the office. Another drawback to the old method of education was that, when the period of pupilage was completed, there was no means whereby the pupil could prove his worth to the public save by the quality of his practice, and it might take many years to gain the public confidence. It was evident that these drawbacks could be overcome by a system of examination which would give an incentive to study, would compel the acquisition of knowledge, and provide a qualification of ability. The theoretical education necessary for the examinations would supplement the practical education derived from apprenticeship.

As the years have passed, the profession of the surveyor has become increasingly important and increasingly difficult. Old rules of thumb and hastily formed opinions, however useful they may be at times, have come to be insufficient. Nowadays a surveyor must show considerable mathematical skill, possess a very wide knowledge, and be able to support his opinion by good reasons and accurate calculations. The demand for this increased efficiency is the natural result of the growth of education. The change is not limited to the surveyor's profession but is common to every profession. It is mainly due to the establishment of the examination system, which has been applied to every profession in Britain for the very purpose of compelling greater efficiency in practice.

So far as the surveyor's profession is concerned, the rapid progress of science and the many recent changes in the law have made it increasingly difficult for a young man to acquire the necessary knowledge. Within the period of my own professional experience new methods of valuation have had to be devised, the rights of agricultural and trade tenants have been increased, the whole system of rating has been remodelled, new systems of building construction have been introduced, and general practice has been altered and refined.

Without doubt the young surveyor of to-day requires a more thorough education than was necessary for his predecessors, and I am convinced that the experience to be gained by him while serving his articles in an office is seldom enough. Much of the work done in an office is of a technical character with which only a principal, or possibly a chief assistant, can deal. Great responsibility is involved in such work, and therefore it cannot rightly be entrusted to a pupil or junior assistant. The pupil may see the result of his principal's work, he may even be employed to some extent in the doing of it, but as a rule he gains no idea of the knowledge that lies behind the work. It is this technical knowledge, so difficult for the pupil to gain from his office experience, that is required for the examinations and which it is the purpose of the examinations to encourage the student to acquire by reading and study in his spare time.

It has seemed to me that the opportunities for acquiring professional knowledge in an office are not so good as they used to be. Drawings that used to be duplicated by tracing are now prepared by a trade process; printed forms have taken the place of hand-written tenancy agreements. Everything has been speeded up and departmentalised, and the principal has less time to give to his pupils.

In my opinion it is increasingly evident that if a young surveyor desires to make progress in his profession he is largely dependent upon what he can learn of the theory and the technical side of his profession in his spare time. There is much more for him to learn, and there is less opportunity for him to learn it in an office.

The professional examinations supply the necessary incentive to individual study. A wide knowledge of the theory of the profession is essential to enable a student to pass these examinations; this knowledge cannot be obtained from office experience alone. Many a young man has told me that he has learned more about his profession in three months' tuition than in the whole of his three years of articles. Many who have started in practice on their own account have discovered that the work they did in preparation for their examinations, though they deemed it at the time to be superfluous, had in fact given them a knowledge which was useful to them in practice every day of their lives.

As I have been personally associated with the examination system for over forty years, perhaps I may be allowed to quote from my own experience in regard to the beneficial influence of the examinations.

I served my articles in a somewhat remote part of the country where I met very few young men in the profession. I had the ambition to pass the examinations of The Institution and to obtain the honour of membership; so I passed the Preliminary Examination during my articles, and devoted a considerable part of my spare time to a study of the professional subjects.

On coming to London I soon became associated with a number of young men with the same ambition as myself. Every one of them was really keen upon learning all he could about the profession, and we spent almost every evening of our lives in doing so. The examinations provided the necessary incentive; we attended all the classes we could find, and were regular attendants at the Junior Meetings of The Institution.

When I commenced to prepare candidates for the examination I met a large number of young men in the same position as I had been. Like their predecessors, nearly all of them were very keen on learning all they could about their profession, and, with the incentive of the examinations, they made excellent progress. It has given me great pleasure to note how these young men have risen in their profession and have come to occupy leading positions. Notwithstanding the increasing difficulties of the profession, they have moved with the times, have mastered the continuous changes in practice, and have done credit to the great Institution with which they are connected.

During the long period in which I have been engaged in preparing candidates for the examinations, I have been concerned with over 25,000 courses of education and have met a great variety of students. The numbers have greatly increased in late years, and perhaps the ambition to learn is less general than formerly; but a large number are as keen as ever, and without doubt there will be plenty of well-educated young men to fill successfully the ranks of The Institution in the future.

Increased Facilities for the acquisition of Knowledge.

There is no difficulty nowadays for a young surveyor to acquire in his spare time the theoretical and technical knowledge that he requires in the practise of his profession, but forty or fifty years ago his opportunities for acquiring such knowledge were but slight. In those days the books of reference were somewhat inadequate and far from easy, and though, after a time, some instruction became available at certain technical colleges and other institutions in London and some of the larger provincial towns, those who, like myself, had experience of the means provided for education in the profession at that period can testify as to its insufficiency. Happily the examiners were not too exacting, so it was possible to become qualified if sufficient endeavour was applied.

In later years certain members of the surveyor's profession appreciated the need for some special tuition, and much progress was made by means of private enterprise. With the resulting increase in the number of candidates for examination, more text-books, in a form better suited for their needs, became available. One of the earliest members of the profession to supply the necessary technical instruction was Sir Philip Pilditch, to whom many of us, including myself, owe a debt of gratitude; I believe he concentrated mainly upon the Valuation Sub-Division. In 1890 Mr. Richard Parry commenced teaching, and attempted to provide adequate teaching in all sub-divisions of the examinations. I became associated with him in the following year, and so remained throughout his life. Owing to the great success of our students their numbers increased rapidly, and the younger members of the profession, realising they could obtain the instruction they needed, began to enter for the examinations in great numbers. Other members of the profession, including my learned friend Mr. Graham Mould, helped in the good work of education.

Notwithstanding the success which had been attained for professional education by means of private enterprise, there were some members of the profession who took the view that the example of other professions, such as law and medicine, should be followed, so that professional education should be controlled by the profession itself.

Prominent among those who adopted this view was Sir William Wells, a Fellow of this Institution. While acting as Chief Live-stock Commissioner during the war he collected from the live-stock auctioneers the sum of £43,332 towards the establishment of a college, and in 1919, while president of the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, founded the College of Estate Management for the general education of all branches of what one may call "the profession of the land," under the auspices of that Institute. Sir William then made arrangements for the College to take over the whole teaching organisation of Messrs. Parry, Adkin, and Parry; suitable premises were acquired at 35, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and teaching at the College commenced in 1921. Sir William Wells became president, and Mr. Richard Parry was appointed principal of the College.

In 1922, on the joint petition of the College, The Surveyors' Institution and the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, a Royal Charter was granted to the College by His Majesty the King. The College was formally opened by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in the spring of the following year.

Ever since its foundation the College has proved a great success, and under the guidance of its Board of Governors, the majority of whom are members of The Surveyors' Institution, the number of students has increased, and a system of education has been provided for the young surveyor (not only in Great Britain, but in the Dominions and Crown Colonies also) which is greatly in advance of anything previously available.

Some existing Deficiencies in Education.

It might well be supposed, with the incentive of the excellent examinations of The Surveyors' Institution and the facilities provided for education, that the young surveyor would be well provided with everything necessary for his rapid progress in the profession. It seems that there is still something lacking.

The reports of the examiners over a considerable period of years are distinctly depressing, and the admirable summary of such reports which is prepared every year by our Secretary indicates the lines of weakness. I think we must accept the examiners' remarks as applying to the less satisfactory candidates, for there is a large number who do really well and are able to prove their worth if they have a proper opportunity.

The first class of weakness indicated by the examiners' reports is bad spelling, bad writing, indifferent English, and want of accuracy and method. This would appear to be the result of insufficient scholastic education, and, if so, I think the recent introduction of the compulsory Preliminary Examination will provide a remedy.

In my opinion the trouble lies deeper than this and is not due solely to an inadequate school training. My experience leads me to conclude that in many cases a boy leaves school at the age of sixteen or seventeen, well educated and accustomed to study. Possibly he has passed an examination exempting him from the Preliminary Examination of

The Surveyors' Institution. He is aware that he cannot take his Intermediate Examination for several years. He goes into an office, but the prospect of the examination is remote. Set free from the discipline of school life, he is apt to consider himself a "young man about town," and to think of things other than his professional education. He forgets much that he has learned at school, he loses his habit of study, he fails to develop his scholastic knowledge and to apply it to the study of his daily work, and in consequence becomes a poor student and an unsatisfactory candidate for examination. The proper remedy here appears to be to provide for continuity of study. The recent decision of the Council allowing a student to take part of the Intermediate Examination before he is nineteen will, I feel, do much to eliminate the defect.

The second class of weakness would appear to consist of the difficulty which many candidates seem to experience in grasping the principles underlying the knowledge they have acquired and in applying it to the practical problems of their profession. The cause of this weakness may, I think, be explained by the fact that a certain number of the candidates of the present day do not regard the examinations from the right standpoint. Instead of looking at the examinations as an opportunity of learning their profession, they regard them solely as a means—unpleasant but necessary—of gaining a qualification, and they desire to pass the examinations with the minimum of trouble to themselves. They are indisposed to study the basic principles which underlie the subjects, or to learn those things which constitute the foundation of the subjects in which they are examined. They regard such knowledge as superfluous because they consider it outside the syllabus and not directly asked for by the examiners. If they can obtain a superficial knowledge sufficient to scrape through the examinations, that is all they care about, and therefore they are disposed to take short courses of preparation, to cram their work instead of studying it deeply, and merely to skim the surface instead of obtaining a real mastery of their subjects and applying their knowledge to their daily work in the office.

A third weakness, disclosed from time to time, is bad drawing. Some of the candidates are unable to draw neatly and accurately, and do not use sketches to illustrate their answers when such use would be advantageous. The candidates have found that they can pass, except in the Building Sub-Division, without being able to draw, so they are disinclined to practise drawing. Mathematics is another weakness, especially in the subjects of mensuration and book-keeping. In mathematics many students are naturally weak, and being informed by those who have failed that it is very difficult to obtain marks in the subjects named, and particularly in mensuration, they tend to lack interest in those subjects. Therefore, owing to the desire to pass with the minimum of trouble, mathematics and drawing are somewhat neglected. It may well be said that no one should be qualified as a surveyor unless he can prove that he can draw and has a reasonable knowledge of mathematics.

Remedies for the Existing Deficiencies in Education.

There would seem to be no doubt that the remedy for the deficiencies, as shown by the examiners' reports, lies in a reorganised examination, whereby all candidates may be compelled, on penalty of failure at their examinations, to show proof of sufficient scholastic knowledge, of a grasp of basic principles and fundamental subjects, of a proficiency in draughtsmanship, and of an adequate acquaintance with mathematics as applied to professional subjects. It is also most desirable that every young surveyor should be able to use and develop the knowledge he has acquired at school, to apply it to his work, and to maintain his habit of study by proceeding with his professional studies immediately after leaving school.

As announced in the Journal of The Surveyors' Institution for June, 1928, the Council have decided to adopt certain recommendations of their Education Committee for the reorganisation of the professional examinations. These recommendations are designed to insure that the future member of The Institution shall obtain a sound training in the basic principles of his profession, and that his course of training shall develop gradually from general scholastic knowledge to the more technical subjects. The danger of superficial cramming is recognised. By means of the new system of examinations the future surveyor will be able to continue his studies without a break on leaving school, and, if he desires to do so, to take the more elementary part of the Intermediate Examination before attaining the age of nineteen. It has been decided that the reorganised system of examination shall come into force in 1932.

This decision appears to supply the necessary remedy for the present unsatisfactory position, and a perusal of the proposed system of examination gives equal grounds for satisfaction. Every young surveyor, after passing a preliminary examination in scholastic subjects, will be obliged to learn to draw well, to show a proficiency in such mathematics as are required for book-keeping, mensuration and trigonometry as applied to land surveying. He will be compelled to know and learn how to use the various instruments employed in surveying, and to know how to make surveys of land and buildings. He will be taught to think as to the reason of things by studying the elements of economics, and will be obliged to obtain a knowledge of central and local government, which will form a suitable foundation for some of the professional subjects. All this he can do if he likes before he is nineteen, and he can by then have made himself a useful assistant.

Whether he takes the more elementary part of the Intermediate Examination before the age of nineteen, or whether he takes the whole examination after that age, he will be obliged to learn all the fundamental subjects of his profession before he reaches the advanced subjects of the Final Examination as now arranged, and by means of this gradual progress should be able to benefit to the fullest possible extent from his education.

In short, the reorganised system of examination would appear to be a great improvement upon the present system, excellent though it is. The reorganised system will induce a more thorough education and a greater certainty of continuity of study, while it should also prove of increased value in weeding out unsuitable candidates and in selecting the best for membership of The Institution. The alterations made in the subjects of examination have been effected without sacrificing those valuable subjects which have been incorporated in the syllabus from the commencement of the examination system, but certain fundamental subjects have been added which should supply that grasp of basic principles which in some cases has been lacking among the candidates of the past.

A young surveyor who has gone through the training necessitated by the examinations, and has obtained good practical training in an office, should be able to make excellent progress in his profession, and to become a successful practitioner at a comparatively early age. The work which he has done in his preparation for his examinations will have supplied him with a vast amount of knowledge which will be at his service throughout the whole of his career. It forms a really sure foundation upon which he can build his practice. He cannot be expected to remember it all as he did when he sat for his examinations, but he will know exactly where to put his hand upon what he requires, and this will prove of great service to him. Given the necessary character and ability, there is little doubt about his eventual success in his profession. By the time he has established himself, has acquired good practical experience and has attained the age of thirty years, he will be eligible to apply for his transfer to that very honourable position the Fellowship of The Surveyors' Institution—the fully qualified Chartered Surveyor.

It may be that some of you who have been so kind as to listen to me will be thinking that I am so immersed in the examinations and the necessary preparations for them that I am oblivious to anything else. That is not so, for I feel as much as any of you that success in this profession is not entirely dependent upon the study of its principles. Every young man must keep himself fit by sport, exercise, and good fellowship, and a young surveyor must learn to talk and to think. These things are a part of his education. I need not dilate upon sport and exercise ; and as to good fellowship, much may be gathered during his association with others who are preparing for the examinations. There are few better opportunities for learning to talk and think than the Junior Meetings of The Institution, to which the Council have given every encouragement from my early days to the present. At these Junior Meetings the young surveyor finds himself among his equals ; good fellowship is encouraged, and many lifelong friendships are made. The Junior Meetings are not confined to London ; many have been started in provincial centres, and are proving a success.

Subjects for Discussion.

In this brief review I have attempted to place before you a short account of what has been done for the education of the young surveyor, and to show you what a great benefit has been conferred upon the profession by The Institution. I now proceed to certain questions affecting the education of a surveyor upon which I invite discussion and have ventured to make a few remarks.

The Scholastic Examination.

It would seem that, owing to the facilities for learning which are provided at every school in the country, a boy should be able to obtain a certificate of adequate scholastic knowledge before he leaves school. Ample provision is made by examinations for the purpose. The taking of the Preliminary Examination of The Institution after leaving school appears to me to be a waste of time, and I should like to impress upon all parents and schoolmasters the importance to every boy who intends to become a surveyor of passing an exempting examination before leaving school.

The Age for leaving School.

Making allowance for the difference in boys and the various rates of their development, I would offer the opinion that for entry into the surveyor's profession, unless it is intended that a boy should go to a university, it is desirable for a boy to leave school at an age not over seventeen years. As a rule a boy of seventeen is more easily taught than one of greater age.

The Length of the Period of Articles.

The profession of a surveyor has ever been far from easy and has become increasingly difficult. Compared with some other professions, such as that of a solicitor, it appears to me to require a far wider knowledge and to incur greater responsibility. A young solicitor should acquire a sound knowledge of procedure, unless, as many solicitors do, he depends upon the clerks in his office; but his studies are limited to legal matters, and on points of law he is able to obtain the opinion of counsel. A young surveyor has to learn the law and practice of a great variety of subjects, and he is entirely dependent upon himself. Notwithstanding this, the required length of articles for the solicitor is five years, but the usual period of pupillage for a surveyor is only three years. As a rule at the end of his articles the young surveyor is but poorly equipped for the practise of his profession, and in order to gain more experience he usually tries to obtain a position as improver or assistant for some years before he attempts to practise. Many a young surveyor has, on the completion of his articles, failed to show sufficient capability to justify his taking a post as a reliable assistant. It would seem that a longer period of articles is worthy of consideration.

There seems to be no reason why a longer period of articles should prove more expensive to a pupil than the customary period of three years, for during the latter years of his pupillage the young man should be of real use to his principal, who would doubtless be disposed to repay some of the premium rather than to charge an extra sum of money, and by so doing would be more likely to retain the services of his pupil. The advantage to the pupil of the longer period of articles would prove considerable, for he would be able to pass all his examinations during his pupillage, and to learn the duties of his profession more thoroughly. Then, being qualified not only by examination but also by five years' experience of practice, he should be in a position either to start in practice on his own account or to take a really responsible post as assistant.

In many cases any length of articles would not ensure that a young man would turn into a good surveyor. Some who enter the profession are unsuitable, but I feel sure that, given a person suitable to the profession, he would have a better chance of becoming a good surveyor by serving articles for five years than for three years.

Compulsory Articles.

At the present time a young man intending to become a surveyor is not bound to take articles; he may accept forthwith a position as paid clerk or assistant if he can secure an appointment. The examinations are open to him in either case, and his progress in the profession is not seriously affected by his choice. In the solicitor's profession articles are compulsory before anyone is permitted to practise, and the clerks are a separate body; but there is nothing to prevent articles being given to a clerk who has shown conspicuous ability. This practice has been followed in the offices of some surveyors. The question as to whether articles should be compulsory for admission to membership of The Institution is debatable. I have met surveyors who prefer to take assistants rather than articulated pupils.

Study before Articles.

Another debatable point is whether a boy leaving school should proceed forthwith into the office of a surveyor and commence his articles of apprenticeship or paid assistantship without delay, or whether he should take a course of study prior to entering an office. I am inclined to think that the latter method is the more advantageous.

In the solicitor's profession it is open to a student to take a course of legal study for one year before being articled to a solicitor, and, if the student passes the prescribed examinations, he can be admitted and enrolled as a solicitor after serving under articles for four years only, instead of the normal period of five years.

Mr. Robert Mills Welsford, in his presidential address to the Law Society in 1928, is reported as having said that "he wished to impress on all members of the profession, on parents, and on schoolmasters, to whom parents often appealed for advice, the importance of a boy taking, before articles, the course of study above referred to. It would give him a good grounding in principles, the practice of which he would find in his master's office; he would start with a grip on the right end of the stick, and would be able on entering an office to take an intelligent interest in what was going on, instead of groping through his work like a blind man."

It would seem that the above remarks are equally applicable to the profession of a surveyor, and that a boy who took a course of study and passed Part I. of the Intermediate Examination as now arranged prior to being articled would be likely to make better progress in his profession, and be more useful to his principal, than one who entered upon his articles immediately on leaving school.

The Professional Examinations.

There have been numerous attempts during recent years to discredit the examination system. In China at one time it is said to have become an abomination. One hears many disparaging remarks about the methods adopted in Britain. Notwithstanding all such views, I am confident that, if properly devised, a system of examination is the best method of inducing young men to acquire such knowledge as is necessary for their progress in whatever line of life they may select.

In the surveyor's profession a system of examination can be so devised as to induce a young man to acquire the theory and the technicalities of his profession. By means of a carefully devised system, well-selected subjects and a really adequate syllabus of each subject, he can be led to acquire the necessary knowledge gradually and thoroughly, and the examinations can be so framed as to test, in each individual case, whether such knowledge has been adequately acquired.

The reorganised system of examination which comes into force in 1932, so far as I have a knowledge of it, seems likely to comply with these requirements. It is undoubtedly a great advance upon the previous system in compelling a more gradual and thorough acquisition of theoretical and technical knowledge.

In my opinion both the Intermediate and Final Examinations are primarily intended as a test whereby a candidate may show if he has a good general knowledge of the large number of subjects comprised in the sub-division of the examination he has selected. Specialised knowledge or much acquaintance with practice cannot be reasonably expected from a candidate who has so many subjects to deal with, and who cannot possibly have obtained much practical experience at the age at which he takes these examinations. On the other hand, questions requiring special knowledge and advanced points of practice are thoroughly suited to an examination in the particular subject in which a candidate desires to specialise, and, as I have indicated later, I think the examinations in single subjects could be extended with advantage.

Many years in the profession are essential to the acquisition of practical experience, and if the Intermediate and Final Examinations were to be regarded as a test thereof, the only feasible method would be to delay these examinations until a student had arrived at the age of at least twenty-five years. To delay the examinations until a student had acquired good practical experience would, in my opinion, be a fatal mistake. The habit of study acquired at school would be lost. Many of those who were busily engaged in practice would find no time or inclination for study and would not take the examinations. Many would have become so immersed in some specialised line of the profession that they would be no longer able to absorb the general knowledge which the examinations require and would fail to pass. These views are not mere arguments, but are derived from my own experience.

It is to be remembered that the examinations of this Institution are not the final qualification for professional membership. No one is eligible for the Professional Associateship until he has passed all the examinations, and has been approved by the Council for election by the members. The average candidate is not eligible for election as a Fellow until many years after he has passed his Final Examination. He must have attained the minimum age of thirty years, and have proved his ability and success in practice to the satisfaction of the Council. The test of practical experience, therefore, is the election to the Fellowship when the member is at least thirty years old, and not the Final Examination which is generally taken some ten years previously.

There are some who think mere success in the profession is an inadequate qualification for the Fellowship, and that a further examination in practical work should be passed as an additional qualification. I have also heard it said that Fellows of The Institution attaining the age of forty or fifty years should be able to enjoy the privilege of an examination in the changes which have taken place during recent years. It would give me pleasure if this idea was adopted, because I feel I should again have the pleasure of talking to many of my old friends; but I ought to say that I regard the present rules of examination (subject to the modifications to be made in consequence of the reorganisation) and the present rules for admission of members as satisfactory. The members of The Institution are able to keep themselves up to date by practise and by studying the Journal of The Institution and other publications, and I doubt if any advantage would be gained by additional examinations.

At the same time it must be recognised that while the Intermediate and Final Examinations are devised for the purpose of encouraging a candidate to acquire a general knowledge of his profession, there are many young men who desire to acquire and afterwards to prove to the public that they have acquired an extremely thorough and practical knowledge of some particular subject in which they intend to specialise. To such men an additional qualification is likely to prove of great value. It makes them prominent, it constitutes a recommendation for a particular post, and, when backed by success, it enables them to obtain highly paid work. Much of the special knowledge they need can be acquired solely by practise, but a large part of it is advanced theory. Examinations in such special subjects are an undoubted advantage. At present they are provided in five subjects, but in my opinion many other subjects could be added. I should like to see the examinations in these special subjects so arranged that a man could proceed with his studies immediately after passing his Final Examination so as to be able to maintain continuity of study. It does not seem impossible to divide such examinations into two stages, one of which might be taken, say, in two years after the Final Examination, and the other later, when the candidate had obtained sufficient practical experience.

Preparation for Examinations.

Before I conclude I would like to say one word as to the preparation for the professional examinations, as some among you may be able to influence the candidates.

The time taken for preparation by candidates is often too short. In the case of those who are engaged in offices during the day time I consider that twelve months is the minimum time which should be devoted to preparation for either the Intermediate or Final Examination, and that eighteen months or two years is preferable. Preparation for a period of six or nine months is suitable only for those who have sat unsuccessfully before, or for some reason have already covered the ground.

Conclusion.

In writing this Paper I have endeavoured to show that from the first adoption of the examination system by this Institution to the present time there has been great progress in education. The effect has been good in every way. The daily work in the office has been supplemented by sound theory. Every encouragement has been given to the acquisition of a knowledge of professional work.

All of us must feel deeply grateful to the Council of The Institution for its continuous zeal in providing increasing facilities and encouragement for the education of the young surveyor, and for the great benefit that it has thus conferred upon the young men of the profession.

A DISCUSSION took place on

THE EDUCATION OF THE YOUNG SURVEYOR.

Mr. C. B. FISHER, C.B.E. (President), in the Chair.

Mr. H. F. CHAMBERS (Professional Associate of Council) said with what pleasure he had accepted the invitation to propose the vote of thanks to Mr. Adkin. Not only was it an honour, but it gave him the happy opportunity of expressing appreciation of the enormous work that Mr. Adkin had done on behalf of the profession. The reputation of The Surveyors' Institution was very largely due to the exceptionally high standard of education required of its members. The acceptance of an examination system carried with it certain risks, but thanks to the energy shown in ensuring a thoroughly sound course of instruction by, in the old days, Parry, Adkin and Parry, and later by the College of Estate Management, those risks had to a large extent been minimised. It was a matter of satisfaction that there had been such close co-operation between the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute and The Surveyors' Institution in all the work connected with the College.

Mr. Adkin, in his concise history of the progress made in education, had shown clearly the value of the education based on the examination system. But what the speaker most liked about his Paper was his frank discussion of existing deficiencies. Those deficiencies could be divided into two classes: first, the tendency towards cramming, and, secondly, the fact that the examinations were apt to produce the academic rather than the practical man. Mr. Adkin rightly suggested that the only method of stopping the tendency towards cramming was to ensure that the candidate treated the examination as an opportunity for acquiring a really sound knowledge of the various professional subjects rather than learning just enough to enable him to scrape through.

Possibly this might be assisted if the results of the examinations were made known. At present they were kept a guarded secret. It would stimulate a healthy ambition to do well in the examination if the results were divided into First, Second, and Third-class Honours, and a Pass.

The examination system must necessarily be based on theoretical knowledge. The course of instruction and examination could not be really a practical test. The candidate was too young to have practical knowledge. But given that the profession accepted the examination system, carrying with it that limitation, it was clearly desirable to make the examination as broad and as consonant with modern tendencies as possible. A working knowledge of all the subjects was desirable in order to enable them to get the right perspective of the subject in which they would presently specialise. There was a danger in passing a candidate on the examination as a whole. Certain papers were marked relatively low as compared with the others. Take book-keeping and accountancy as an example. Fifty marks out of a total of a thousand for so vital a subject was too small a proportion. He himself, to his subsequent regret, at the time of taking his examination disliked book-keeping intensely, and decided to leave it severely alone and make up for it on the other subjects. That, he said, thanks to Mr. Adkin's able tuition, was successfully accomplished. That showed the danger of allowing the candidate to pass on the examination as a whole and not on each individual subject.

He remembered opening a discussion at a Junior Meeting of The Institution on that very subject of the examinations, and the most noticeable feature of the debate afterwards was the very general realisation that the tendency of examinations was to produce the academic rather than practical man. He was of opinion that to have examinations as the sole test of admission to The Institution was a grave danger. It would be an advantage to synchronise the practical with the theoretical training of the young surveyor as far as possible.

On the subject of articles he was enthusiastic, thanks to the personal benefit he had himself derived from them. He would even suggest compulsory articles to the extent of possibly three years. The young fellow then, while training for his examination, would get a practical knowledge of the general work of an office. For the purpose of discussion the speaker would suggest a three-year contract for articles with a firm of which at least one member was a fellow of The Surveyors' Institution. There was, however, the objection on the score of expense to the candidate. The cost would be increased by possibly £50 up to £100 a year, and that might have the tendency to keep out of the profession the very men whom it was most desirable to bring in. It was possibly a doubtful policy to make the profession too exclusive or to drive those men into other bodies. But he was convinced of the value of articles as a system of training. He would also emphasise the need of giving the candidate really responsible work to do, and of putting him on his own initiative. Given ordinary determination, he would do it somehow. It was only when the article pupil was put on his mettle and given a responsible job that he really learned anything.

He had been pleased to hear Mr. Adkin's reference to the value of the Junior Meetings. As a Junior Member the speaker could testify to the value they were to the members. As a member of the Committee also he desired to thank Mr. Adkin for the support he had given to the organisation of the Juniors as a valuable factor in their training. It only remained for him to propose the vote of thanks, which he did with much pleasure.

Mr. SYDNEY A. SMITH (Fellow) said that he was very glad to have the opportunity of seconding the vote of thanks to his very old friend Mr. Adkin, because it reminded him that it was not less than thirty years ago since he (the speaker) was sitting for the examination. When Mr. Adkin had impressed upon him as well as others the necessity for learning much more than was required merely to pass the examinations, those of them who were fortunate enough as young men to have been in contact with Mr. Adkin had never forgotten that.

There was one recommendation in the Paper which impressed itself upon him—the course of education in the elementary part of the profession for young men before they became pupils. His own experience was that pupils during the first twelve months in an office usually showed such complete ignorance of professional work that they had to spend all their time in just gaining sufficient information to grasp the fundamental things relating to a surveyor's duties. It must be borne in mind that surveyors were business men first and surveyors afterwards, and the young men who came to their offices had to learn the ordinary routine of business, account-keeping, and the like, and their specialised training as surveyors came afterwards. He was inclined to think that the elementary course suggested might be extraordinarily good for young men, particularly if a general business training were coupled with instruction in the elementary part of the profession.

In the Paper Mr. Adkin repeated a remark often made by pupils that they learned more from the examination study than they did from the work in the office. He thought that claim was wrongly based. The tutor might sow the seed and reap the harvest, but the office prepared the soil in which the seed was to be sown. He was sure that was the right interpretation of the pupil's remarks. The previous speaker had said that the examination system had a tendency to make for academic rather than practical surveyors. Much as examinations were condemned, he (Mr. Smith) held the view that an examination could not be satisfactorily passed without practical experience. The remark that the examination test was the sole test of membership was not quite correct, because every application was scrutinised to see that the candidate had been trained in a proper office, and further practical experience was required before he could become a corporate member. It could be observed in the Valuation Sub-Division, and, possibly, in other sub-divisions, how completely the subjects of the examination covered those of the professional life of the surveyor. But, of course, the examination itself did not attempt to be an exhaustive test of knowledge of each subject, and specialised subjects must be studied in greater detail. At the same time he thought that a higher standard in building construction should be required as part of the valuation surveyor's examination.

Mr. Adkin had referred to the lack of general education displayed by the candidates. That was one of the distressing things the examiner met with in marking papers, but the Education Committee had given very careful consideration to the matter, and the scheme now evolved by which a boy might continue his school studies, pass his purely educational tests, and take the elementary part of the intermediate subjects, following on his first entry into the profession, should do a great deal to eliminate certain of those complaints. The decision of the Council to insist on a preliminary scholastic examination should also carry the problem a step nearer solution. One of the difficulties necessarily to be faced under the examination system was the fact that men must take their examinations at an early age, and in practical subjects, like valuation, for example, it was next to impossible to have acquired deep practical knowledge at the age of 23 or 24. Much of the present criticism arose from the fact that the age of the men who had taken the examination was overlooked.

He thought that Mr. Adkin might have said in his Paper just a little bit more about the B.Sc. degree in Estate Management of the University of London. The Surveyors' Institution had in a measure delegated its examining powers to the Universities of London and Cambridge, inasmuch as it accepted in lieu of its own examinations the B.Sc. degree in Estate Management of the former university, and the B.A. degree in Rural Estate Management of the latter, in lieu of The Institution examinations. The B.Sc. degree of London was not sufficiently known among young men. It provided a very complete course of study; it would be an advantage to the men who passed it, and would assist the profession as a whole by enhancing the status of its members. He would recommend the B.Sc. degree also to older men. Even the matriculation difficulty might be overcome (as to which information would be given by the University of London), and he would like it to go forth to some of their middle-aged surveyors that the B.Sc. was well worth their while to obtain. The scholarships offered by The Institution tenable at Oxford or Cambridge and other universities also presented a wonderful opportunity of obtaining the highest possible education. The amounts attached to those scholarships had recently been substantially increased, and he was sorry to find that the competition for them was not as great as it might be.

He wished to second the vote of thanks with the greatest pleasure and affection, for there was no man in the profession who had a bigger brain or a kinder heart than the author of the Paper.

Mr. J. A. F. WATSON (Professional Associate) (Hon. Secretary of the Junior Organisation) said that he desired to add his own thanks to what had already been said. Mr. Adkin was their professional house master, and they regarded him with that respect and affection which had been the reward of house masters from earliest times. He had spoken of the inadequate education given in the past, but it must be remembered with regard to a good many who had received that purely practical education that the inadequacy was not apparent in their professional life afterwards. When Mr. Adkin spoke of deficiencies in the education of the surveyor, the speaker could not help reflecting on what was an interesting historical fact, that always in the past the father had said to the son "Nowadays you have opportunities I never had when I was at school," and the speaker himself supposed that he would one day say to his own son, if he ever had one, "You have no excuse whatever for failing in your Intermediate Examination. Look at the opportunities you have nowadays." But Mr. Adkin was exceptional; having spent many years in bringing the scheme of professional education nearer to perfection, he did admit that there were still deficiencies, and it was because of those deficiencies that the meeting was called to consider the subject that evening.

Mr. Adkin had referred to bad spelling and bad composition, and the Education Committee had made some suggestions whereby some of those difficulties might be met. He had also referred to a second class of weakness consisting in "the difficulty which many candidates had in grasping the principles underlying their knowledge and in applying it to the practical problems of their profession." Mr. Adkin explained that by saying that there was a tendency for the young man to regard his education as a rather burdensome means to the end of qualification; hence the tendency to cramming. But, with the greatest respect, the speaker doubted whether that was the deepest cause. He wondered whether the failure was not due rather to lack of opportunity. The calling of the surveyor was extraordinarily practical, far more so than that of other professions. Undoubtedly their fathers were educated in the school of practical experience; if, conversely, their education had been solely from the text-book, he doubted whether The Institution would exist to-day.

It seemed to him that theoretical education must be ripened by practical experience, and that there were some things which could not be learned from a text-book. He himself once took a course in valuation, and in the first paper set he was told that to compute the capital value he must apply the appropriate years' purchase to the net annual value; and he was told how to compute the years' purchase in every circumstance; but he was never told how to arrive at the net annual value itself. The reason was that valuation was an art which was born of judgment and experience, and not an arithmetical calculation. Lectures such as these were of immense use, and taught one to do the necessary actuarial calculations, but they ought not to deceive themselves that lectures could teach them the art of valuing. He did not want Mr. Adkin to think that he was trying to decry theoretical education; he was not doing so; he was only contrasting it with the need for more opportunity of practical education, which was of vital importance.

The subject of compulsory articles had been touched upon. He agreed with Mr. Chambers in thinking it an anomaly that in law and accountancy five years' articles were compulsory, yet in the surveyors' profession, which was far more practical than either, and of far wider scope, no articles whatever were required for qualification. At present employment in a surveyor's office only was necessary for qualification. The fullest possible inquiry, he thought, should be made into the nature of the employment which the candidate had undertaken in that surveyor's office. He had known several cases of young men employed in chartered surveyors' offices, and yet the department in which they were employed precluded them from gaining the knowledge and experience which the articulated pupil would have acquired, and was essential for their training. He was aware that various objections could be raised to articles. One was on the ground of expense. But, of course, the College of Estate Management was also expensive, and so was the examination fee, yet nobody had suggested that the College education or the examinations should be abolished in favour of those who could not afford them. Moreover, there was no reason why an employer should not present an industrious clerk with his articles when he felt that he had earned them, as was the case in the law. If the educational classes could so train the mind to learn later from practical experience, then surely they had fulfilled their function.

Mr. Chambers had said something about Junior Organisation propaganda. Mr. Adkin had told them that in his young days he reaped a great advantage from attending Junior Meetings. If such meetings were educational, then surely they were still more so now, and it was most unfortunate that the time-table of the College of Estate Management precluded Mr. Adkin's pupils from enjoying what he had enjoyed. Far be it from him to suggest that Mr. Adkin's lectures were of less value than Papers read at Junior Meetings, but if Mr. Adkin could on six occasions a year take a half-holiday, his pupils might have a note in red letters on their time-tables reminding them to come to the Junior Meetings on those six days. They would then have a chance of gaining the educational advantages Mr. Adkin had enjoyed in his own youth.

Mr. E. P. WELLER (Professional Associate), lecturer on Estate Management, Cambridge University, after also expressing his thanks to Mr. Adkin for his Paper, and for the help he had given and continued to give to so large a proportion of the members of the profession who passed through his hand, said that he would like to ask Mr. Adkin to extend that help further by saying a little more on a subject not directly dealt with in his Paper. He wanted Mr. Adkin to say something as to the place and function of the university in the specialised education of the surveyor.

The B.A. degree in Estate Management at Cambridge, like the London degree, was accepted by The Institution as exempting from the professional examinations. The London degree, however, was an external degree; the Cambridge

B.A., on the other hand, was an internal degree, only to be obtained by residence in the university and by taking a course of teaching therein. The examination at Cambridge, therefore, was secondary to the teaching; it was merely, as it were, a consummation of the teaching course.

It interested him very much to see from Mr. Adkin's able Paper there seemed to have been a change of emphasis in the relationship between the examinations and education. He noticed that Mr. Adkin throughout his Paper used the broad term "education" and not the narrower term "training." He took it that when the examinations started they were designed merely as a practical test, but he thought most people would now agree that practical knowledge and skill could not be tested by an examination. There were many cases in which the acknowledged expert had failed in the very subject in which he had specialised, while the theorist had gained a prize. In the early days of the examinations no educational facilities were available, but they had grown up to meet the need of the examinations. He was very pleased to see from Mr. Adkin's Paper that he considered that the form of the examinations should be moulded by the most desirable educational scheme, the education coming first, and then the examination coming at the end of it in order to determine to what extent the pupil had profited by the education he had received.

When the speaker began to think about the question of specialised university teaching in Estate Management, he was met by two streams of destructive criticism. On the one hand it was said to be no part of the function of a university to provide vocational training or professional qualifications; on the other hand it was said that estate management could not be taught or the surveyor educated in the lecture-room. Yet the Estate Management degree in Cambridge and the London B.Sc. in Estate Management had been established, and both those degrees had been accepted by The Surveyors' Institution as exempting from its professional examinations. He was encouraged by the Paper to think that it was possible to solve those difficulties, and that there was really a place for university teaching in the education of the surveyor. In law, in engineering, in medicine, and in architecture, that fact was widely acknowledged. The teaching provided at universities, even at the older universities, and the degrees which they gave in those subjects, were recognised as the highest qualification. Although it might be said that the man who studied those subjects in the universities had lost time which perhaps might have been spent in acquiring practical experience, yet those men, when their theoretical education had been supplemented by professional training, were considered to be highly qualified, and often rose to high places in their professions. The value of university education in the surveyors' profession should be more widely recognised. Even in business—very specialised business—be believed that its worth was becoming generally appreciated, and that while the university man started perhaps with a handicap in regard to time, he very soon made up, thanks not merely to the education which he received, but to the broad outlook and the knowledge of affairs gained at the university. In no profession more than that of the surveyor was that sort of experience useful. It had been said that not academic teaching, nor even practical experience, would really make the first-class surveyor, but that what was wanted was common-sense and a knowledge of men. Those things certainly did go a long way, and they were things which could not be taught, but a man might have them bred in him and might develop them by mixing with other men.

He was glad to think from the whole trend of the Paper that the education of the surveyor could be reconciled with the proper function of the university, and that the remodelling of The Institution's examinations was taking place along the lines of sound knowledge and familiarity with fundamental subjects. That sort of grounding was being provided for the young surveyor by the university, and formed, in Mr. Adkin's words, "a really sure foundation upon which to build his practice." If Mr. Adkin would say what he considered to be the precise function of the university in that connection, and the scheme of education which he thought it ought to provide for the prospective surveyor, he would still further increase the debt which the speaker personally and which the profession owed to him.

Mr. A. W. DAVSON (Fellow) joined in the congratulations to Mr. Adkin for his very interesting Paper. It was a subject of tense interest to him, and one which it was impossible in a few minutes even to start to talk about. But he would concentrate on the question of professional examinations, their value, and the minimum age at which they should be taken. He was speaking from the point of view of a quantity surveyor; also he was not now speaking of articulated pupils.

In his view the present system—under which boys somewhere about the age of 17 entered an office very often with no distinct views as to their future career at all—was not satisfactory. After those boys had been in the office for some time, they found themselves confronted with a barrier of examinations. They learned that The Institution required candidates to take the examination young. Under such conditions examinations tended to become the be-all and end-all of the candidate, something which he must pass at all costs and as rapidly as possible. The result was that they found that they had not acquired knowledge of value to them afterwards. But the new system was an obvious gesture towards closer co-operation, and afforded a link between the school and the Final Examination. Its success depended upon two absolute essentials. He did not quite agree with Mr. Adkin, who, however, had in this respect infinitely more experience than himself, that boys of to-day with their wider opportunities for education were less willing to learn than in the past.

The type of boy the profession desired to welcome was the type who had an idea of what he wanted and was on the look out for it. The speaker thought, therefore, that it was very much the duty of The Institution to make clear to boys the characteristics and qualifications which were required, the courses of training recommended, the tests or examinations it would be necessary to pass for the various branches of the profession, and the rewards they carried.

He had just heard that The Institution was taking a very considerable step in this direction. He hoped that policy would be very fully developed.

Then there was a second necessity which was most important, namely, that the age for the professional examinations should be raised. The debate indicated the tendency of many surveyors to accept as a fact and with regret that the examinations must necessarily be theoretical tests. Quantity surveyors in certain quarters were, however, unanimous that five years' training altogether, three of which should be in a quantity surveyor's office, were necessary before the Final Examination could properly be taken. They believed that at the end of three years under those conditions it was possible to test a knowledge of first principles and their practical application, and that at the end of five years the candidate could show that he had the grounding, both practical and theoretical, necessary to his future career. The speaker felt that that was in accordance with the intent of the new curriculum, but if the present minimum age was retained it would ruin the whole scheme. Assuming the age Mr. Adkin suggested of leaving school at 17. Assuming, also, that a year's course was taken and the first part of the Intermediate passed at 18. The boy would then enter an office at 18—a new life in which it would take him some time to settle down—and within the same year he was to absorb the necessary knowledge to take his Intermediate, Part II., which knowledge quantity surveyors knew could only come to a normal boy entering that branch of the profession by practical training in an office for a minimum period of three years. It was impossible.

From enquiries he had made, it seemed to the speaker that the same applied to other branches of the profession also. The whole reason they accepted as a fact that an examination must be purely a theoretical test was because the test was applied too young. It was unfair to candidates in the long run, to educationists, to examiners and to principals to permit that, and, by permitting it, to encourage it.

If candidates under the new system, starting from school worked slowly and methodically, combining practical and theoretical training and with time, in the summer months at least, to engage in sport and social life, they would find that when the time arrived to take the respective tests that they had learned sufficient to pass them, and had in addition accumulated a store of knowledge the value of which they would only realise at a later stage in their career.

The subject of economics was being introduced, and on that he would like to say a word. No subject could be of more importance, but one thing he would like to urge was that its practical application to the profession should be made clear. He referred particularly to the law concerning the division of employments and the completion of labour. If that law was thoroughly understood, it would bring home to every single one of them the power of The Institution, the power of the individual arising out of his relation to The Institution, and the tremendous future that lay before The Institution and its individual members if that power was properly utilised.

Mr. J. F. BOWDEN (Member of Council) joined with the previous speakers in thanking Mr. Adkin. On reading the Paper he noticed the remark "a young surveyor must learn "to talk and to think." He would deal only with the thinking aspect. In his opinion the young surveyor must be constantly thinking and adding to his knowledge of principles, because it was only by hard thinking and cultivated ability, combined with tact and judgment, that he could create and successfully use the powers of initiative and resourcefulness which were such invaluable assets to the surveyor. He could not think correctly and fluently and show a broad grasp of business problems unless he had a thoroughly sound general education and his training and experience went much beyond the particular sub-division which he took for his examination. The examination test was a means to an end, namely, qualification for a junior membership of The Institution. To his own sub-division he should gradually add subjects likely to be of use in the class of practice into which he was thrown. For example, an examinee in the Valuation Sub-Division should have a good working knowledge of agriculture or of building construction, or preferably both, and a study of subjects connected with land and buildings would greatly facilitate his valuation practice and put him "streets ahead" of the man who possessed only an academic knowledge of valuations.

Some men took more than one sub-division, and if they had the energy and opportunity for doing that it was all to the good; but in any event there was no reason why it should not become a far more general rule for young surveyors to be coached by the College of Estate Management or some other competent body in selected subjects likely to be useful. One or two subjects might be taken during each winter session. Versatility was required in their profession, perhaps almost more than in any other, and young surveyors would be well repaid by acquiring it.

Mr. W. R. JENKINS (Fellow) referred to a sentence in the Paper in which Mr. Adkin said :—

"Making allowance for the difference in boys and the various rates of their development, I would offer the opinion that for entry into the surveyor's profession, unless it is intended that a boy should go to a university, it is desirable for a boy to leave school at an age not over 17 years."

The conclusion one came to from that paragraph was that a backward boy or one a little dull should leave school at 17 or a little later, and one more promising or brilliant should leave considerably earlier. He would suggest that a boy who was not brilliant would not generally obtain his school certificate at 17, and Mr. Adkin in a previous paragraph said that he would stress the importance of headmasters and parents of boys insisting on the obtaining of the school certificate before leaving school, or on passing some other examination, exempting from the Preliminary Examination of The Institution. With that conclusion the speaker entirely agreed. It should be no part of the work of the College of Estate Management to prepare those school subjects. The boy who was rather backward could hardly obtain the school certificate at 17, and the more forward boy would be well advised to stay at school a few terms longer with the object of obtaining a school certificate with credit in five subjects, which would secure him exemption from the Matriculation Examination at London University. He would then be able to proceed to take the B.Sc. in Estate Management.

With regard to that degree, he desired to add just this to the remarks made by Mr. Sydney Smith, that the B.Sc. was not entirely divorced from The Surveyors' Institution. It was instituted largely through the instrumentality of Sir William Wells and his brother, the late Sir Sydney Russell-Wells, then Vice-Chancellor of the university. The Senate of the University was advised on all matters relating to the degree by a committee of which about 60 per cent. was composed of members of The Institution, and several Fellows of The Surveyors' Institution were members of the Board of Examiners. Therefore The Institution was closely linked to the university in that degree, and should give to that degree an even greater measure of encouragement and support than it had done hitherto. As Mr. Sydney Smith and Mr. Weller had said, The Institution had done a great deal in that way in granting exemption to degree-holders. It remained, then, for the individual members to support the degree to a greater extent than hitherto, either by taking it themselves, or, what he more particularly wanted to stress, by emphasizing, whether as parents or prospective principals, the importance of every boy or girl of more than average ability remaining at school and obtaining a school certificate with five credits in the required subjects.

To sum up, his point was that boys who were backward should stay at school sufficiently long to obtain a certificate, and that boys above the average should stay sufficiently long to obtain a certificate with five credits and so be able to proceed to work for the degree of B.Sc. of London University—assuming, of course, they were not prepared to go to Cambridge.

Mr. E. WITTON BOOTH, M.B.E. (Fellow), recalled his first acquaintance with Mr. Adkin's old firm when their offices were almost opposite the front door of The Institution in Great George Street. He himself had spent about four years in devoting a large proportion of time in a very similar occupation to that of Mr. Adkin, that was, in the preparation of students for examinations, and although that was now over fifteen years ago, one naturally wished to compare the author's experience with one's own. One thing upon which they would be quite agreed was that the movement to introduce the keenness of schoolboy study into professional work was most excellent. After a boy left school a period of apathy and indifference towards study was apt, unless counteracted by an impetus towards further advancement. If, for example, a boy left school at 16, and did not begin to read for his professional examinations until he was about 19, he tended to lose much of his educational keenness and exactitude, whilst other attractions, such as sport and pleasure, made increasing demands on his time. That, at least, was the speaker's experience at the time he was a coach, and he thought it probably accounted for a good deal of the faults which the examiners had repeatedly deplored. There was, however, a certain amount of encouragement to be gained from a study of the examination papers of to-day. He himself was one of the examiners from 1921 to 1923, and some of the mistakes one came across them in spelling and in expressions were simply appalling. But after spending two or three days going through a large number of this year's examination papers, one could not help realising that a great improvement was apparent in that respect. By the means now proposed to eradicate that period of slackness in a boy's life a still further improvement might reasonably be expected.

Time would not permit discussion of all the points he would like to refer to, but he would like to point out one particularly in the interests of youths who were embarking on their careers in official appointments, such, for instance, as those in municipal engineering and in county valuation offices. Probably many present might know that local government officers had dreamed a great dream which had now come true; they had got superannuation. That, however, was not an unmixed blessing. Before superannuation about 45 years of age might have been taken as the maximum for a chief appointment; even to-day that was, in fact, often the advertised maximum limit of age, but, in practice, it was often nearer 40. That reduction in the age limit was, in the speaker's opinion, largely due to superannuation, to the desire to obtain a longer period of service before the eventual retiring age. It meant, however, that men in official appointments had to reach their zenith at say, 35 to 40 years, whilst they were in the early prime of life. The Institution and other Institutions, by their examinations, should do what they could to help all such men to start early, for the fight of their lives was going to be somewhere between the ages of 25 to 38.

There was one other point he wanted to mention. Mr. Adkin had pointed out that a two years' course was most desirable, also that it was a very good thing if another year could be added as a kind of preparatory course in front of that. The speaker had not seen the syllabus of the College of Estate Management for some time, so that he had not had the opportunity of totalling up the extent of the fees payable, but he did know this, that all surveyors were not blessed with four-figure incomes, and many of them had, or at least their parents had, to limit their preparation courses to their purse. He would, however, go all the way with Mr. Adkin in saying that a six-months' course was altogether too short under ordinary circumstances, although, no doubt, it could be justified when the candidate had had considerable experience in the practical work required.

Mr. G. F. J. MORGAN (Professional Associate) thought that the meeting was an indication of the great interest which the Council was taking in the Junior Members, who, he felt sure, thoroughly appreciated the encouragement given. The examiners in their Annual Report, as well as Mr. Adkin and Mr. Sydney Smith that evening, had all been giving the candidate a rather bad character. The speaker had been privileged to act as moderator for some years, and he knew how the unfortunate candidate entered the examination room and found in front of him a paper which would take an experienced surveyor nine or ten hours to complete, whereas the candidate had to answer the questions in two and a half or three hours. It was not at all surprising in such circumstances that simple errors were made.

On the question of articles, he would like to take up Mr. Chambers' remarks. He believed that articles should be with a chartered surveyor. That was essential; because, in spite of the scrutiny to which Mr. Smith had referred, there were cases where young men, perhaps without a friend in the profession, had decided to take up the occupation of a surveyor, and had paid a large premium for the privilege of entering an unqualified practitioner's office, where they got no professional training as surveyors at all. Any training they received was through their attendance at the College of Estate Management. He knew people who had suffered in that way, and it was a state of affairs which ought to be ended.

Mr. B. H. KNIGHT (Professional Associate) said that his first impression on reading the Paper was that it was so sound he could not criticise it at all. But, like Mr. Witton Booth, he recalled his experiences as a teacher in some of the subjects of which it was thought they should have a knowledge as surveyors. He thought of one who was the best man on the practical side of land surveying he had ever known. When his case came before the Board of Examiners at University College, London, everybody said that he had certainly failed. The speaker, however, could not take that view, for here was a good practical man. After some trouble the man was passed. He went to a job on a certain arterial road in the north of London, and within six months there came a request from his employer for another man like him.

The speaker thought that the practical side of the examination could be very well developed, and he suggested that an oral examination for building candidates on the subject of building materials would prove of great benefit. He went on to say that in public work The Institution was not represented as it should be. In municipal work particularly their light had been somewhat hidden under a bushel. As quite a beginner he desired to say that he had found the examinations of the utmost value in his calling as a public engineer and surveyor. With regard to the B.Sc. degree in Estate Management, he believed that that degree would in the next twenty or thirty years largely supplant the examinations of The Institution. The standard aimed at in that degree was one that was bound to make its mark as time went on. Moreover, it involved no annual subscription, and, once obtained, there was nothing to worry about at all.

The PRESIDENT said that he would have liked to have heard something about the standard of examination, or rather, the standard of marks given by the examiners. It was known that only about 55 per cent. were successful in passing the examinations, and he had heard it said that the standard was far too high.

There were two opposite points of view which, he thought, were evident to them all. In the first place, by setting a high standard, they were forming in the public mind the idea of efficiency, and that was borne out by the fact that practically all public appointments in connection with work covered by one or other branch of the profession were held now by members of The Institution. In the second place, was it an advantage to those who presented themselves for examination that they should know at an early date that they were not likely to be successful in their career? That was a difficult matter to gauge, because it was not easy to say that anyone who was not very successful in the examination test might not be successful in business in his future career. Some men from the public schools, who had proved to be quite good and capable men in their career, had not necessarily done well at school.

Several points of the greatest importance had been touched upon in the discussion. Mr. Chambers had referred to the question of practical education. There was one way, possibly, out of the difficulty he had suggested, namely, that during the time a pupil was articled he might be studying for the examination by correspondence. He had known that done in several cases, and thought it was successful. No doubt it was better, if possible—and that applied, of course, to those living in London—that they should be in touch with their lecturers, but for those who had not that opportunity the combination he had just suggested might be desirable.

Mr. Davson had referred to the question of economics. He was glad he had done so, because he thought that in after life there was nothing of more advantage to the community and the individual than the fact that he knew how to take part in the public work of the country. The speaker had had considerable experience in that field himself, and he had never regretted it.

The discussion had been of benefit to them all. He called upon those present to accord heartily to Mr. Adkin the vote of thanks which had been proposed.

The vote of thanks was accorded with acclamation.

Written communication from the author (Mr. B. W. ADKIN):—

Owing to the lengthy discussion and the lateness of the hour at which the meeting ended, I felt it to be undesirable to reply verbally, and have, therefore, put a reply into writing.

The Standard of the Examinations and Marking.

In some of the earlier drafts of my Paper I made lengthy reference to these matters, but afterwards eliminated them as being somewhat delicate questions to deal with. Now that the President has asked for my views, it becomes my duty to say something upon the matter.

I am of the opinion that the standard of the examinations has been raised in recent years, but not unduly. Such criticism as I might make would be directed to the methods of examining and especially to the lack of uniformity in the papers set by the different examiners. Many of the papers are beyond reproach, but some have been set which I regard as scarcely fair to the candidates. Perhaps I may suggest certain principles which I consider should be observed in setting examination papers:—

- (1) Every question should be upon the subject of the paper and be unequivocally referable thereto.
- (2) Every question should be within the syllabus of the subject as published by The Institution.
- (3) Every question should be accurately printed and so expressed as to be easily understood, and, in particular, all drawings to be scaled from, should be accurately drawn to scale and all mathematical questions correctly stated.
- (4) Every paper of questions should be designed so as to find out what the candidate knows, and should not be directed to out-of-the-way points of which it is probable that few, if any, candidates will have a knowledge.
- (5) Every paper of questions should be so framed that it can be answered by an average candidate within the time allowed.
- (6) No paper should be expressed at so great a length that no average candidate could read it carefully and master the meaning of the questions within a reasonable time.
- (7) Where there are separate papers in the same subject for the Intermediate and Final Examinations and a separate syllabus for each, no question should be set at the Intermediate Examination upon a matter which is covered solely by the syllabus of the Final.
- (8) Where there are typical and non-typical papers in the same subject, the non-typical paper should be considerably easier than the typical paper.

- (9) It should not appear from the questions that the examiner is not up to date in his subject.

With regard to the marking by the examiners, I have nothing to guide me beyond the results shown to me by unsuccessful candidates, which I have been able to compare with the work such candidates have done in preparation for their examinations. The marks awarded in certain subjects appear to me to be very low and in others unduly high, and here again I would plead for greater uniformity.

The Results of Examinations.

The suggestion made by Mr. Chambers that the results of the examinations should be published as first, second and third class honours, and passes, commends itself to me, as I think it would prove an encouragement to candidates to try to do well at their examinations. I would, however, suggest that, if such a method was adopted, that there should be only three classes, the third representing the passes. The Universities and the Council of Legal Education have adopted a system of this kind, and, perhaps, the Council might favour the matter with their consideration.

The age at which the Professional Examinations should be taken.

Mr. Davson spoke of the necessity for raising the age at which the professional examinations could be taken. I am sorry to disagree, but my disagreement is not so great as might appear, for I strongly object to hurrying the preparation for examinations. I have no doubt that under the reorganised system of examination it will, in many cases, be five years or more between the time when a boy leaves school and when he passes his final examination, but there is so much difference between the rate of progress which boys make, and between the opportunities which boys may have, that I regard any fixed limits as objectionable.

Under the new system of examination I think education will be more gradual and more thorough, and will necessitate a longer period of preparation, but, as I have stated in my Paper, theoretical training should be continuous, and I would advise, except during the earliest period after leaving school, that the practical training should be concurrent and also be continuous.

In my Paper I have given reasons why I consider the raising of the age limit would be a mistake, and I am thankful, for the good of The Institution, that the rules of examination are as they stand.

University Education.

The benefits obtainable from an education at Oxford or Cambridge are undoubted. A social advantage arises which is otherwise unobtainable, and instruction is given which cannot be surpassed. I have every sympathy with Mr. Weller in his advocacy of the new degree in Estate Management at Cambridge, but if a boy has the ability, I think he could better use his time at the University by aiming somewhat higher, e.g., by reading for the Natural Science Tripos.

The B.Sc. degree in Estate Management at the University of London is an entirely different matter. It does not confer the social advantages obtainable at Oxford or Cambridge, but it does confer a University degree which carries weight. It has the great advantage of being exclusively an external degree so that it does not interfere with the practical work in an office. I have had a good deal to do with the organisation of the degree, and I am most anxious for its success. As it is a University degree, I hope that it will maintain the high standard of examination which was originally intended.

Education after passing the Examinations.

Mr. Bowden referred to the necessity for versatility in the profession, and suggested it should become more general for young surveyors to acquire knowledge outside their own sub-division. I strongly endorse this view, especially for candidates in the provinces where the work in an office embraces so wide a field.

The Institution has encouraged the idea by offering additional diplomas in sub-divisions other than that taken by a candidate. It is one of the objects of the College of Estate Management to provide instruction in subjects other than those required for a particular examination. The advice of the College is always at the service of every young surveyor who desires to improve his education.

PAPER No. 521.

RIGHTS IN UNDERGROUND WATER.

By W. Vaux Graham, M.Inst.C.E. (Associate) and Harold F. Bidder (Barrister-at-Law) (Associate).

*To be read at the Ordinary General Meeting of The Surveyors'
Institution on Monday, 6th May, 1929.*

In the two previous Papers upon Underground Water, read by the authors before The Institution (the last of them eighteen years ago) they set out to examine the problem that is presented by the application of modern conditions to the law with regard to percolating underground water, and describe the various attempts made to meet the difficulties involved, and to suggest possible lines of advance.

The difficulties are clear and well known. They are shortly these:—

The English law recognises no property in water until it is taken into possession—actually “captured,” so to speak. Nor does the law in England recognise any right in a land-owner to be assured of the use of any water that may be percolating or standing under or on the surface of his land, as against those who by operations elsewhere can drain it away or prevent it coming. (This is not so in the American version of English law, as will be seen.)

The only protection that the law affords is to the right to receive the flow of a stream and to get rid of it again, whether above or below ground—the idea of a stream below ground, known and defined, being a pleasant theoretical fiction which never has been and never can be realised in fact.

The problem that arises is, of course, this—that it is possible to disturb underground water conditions with such violence as to inflict serious injury upon persons who had relied for their supplies upon the existing state of affairs.

The parting of the ways came for English law in a mining case (Acton v. Blundell [1843], 12 M. & W., 324) where the owner of a well sought to restrain a landowner from sinking a mine shaft that would deplete his well. There was then disclosed the clash of interests; on the one hand the requirements of a landowner desiring to extract coal from under his land, on the other hand the needs of another landowner wishing to obtain water from his well. The coal mine won, largely on the ground that the untraceable source of supply afforded by percolating water was too indefinite to protect. This principle has never since been departed from in England.

The principal sources of disturbance of underground water conditions on a large scale are four:—

- (1) Mining operations;
- (2) Pumping large quantities of water for private business purposes;
- (3) Pumping large quantities of water for public distribution;
- (4) Tapping underground water that is under sufficient pressure to overflow at the surface (artesian wells).

While English law recognises no difference between any of these cases and leaves the landowner completely free to work any havoc he can upon the underworld of water, America has taken a different line, which has been considerably developed since our last Paper was read.

Shortly the American doctrine is that the right of a landowner with regard to the water under his land is to use it reasonably for purposes connected with the use of his land, but not to sell or transport it to the detriment of another landowner. Thus in America the extraction of water for public supply by a landowner is an infringement of the right of an adjoining landowner who is injured thereby, and therefore gives rise to a claim for injunction or compensation. On the other hand, water may be extracted by a landowner in any quantity without regard to injuries inflicted elsewhere, for use in the processes of a business conducted on his lands, but not for sale, for example, in the form of mineral water or ice. Although the question does not seem to have arisen, presumably breweries would fall within the latter principle of exception.

In the case of Schenk v. City of Ann Arbor (1917), 196 Mich., 75, a municipality set up a large pumping plant for the supply of its city, and the owner of land adjoining the site took action in respect of injury to the land by the withdrawal of percolating water. The court would not grant an injunction, but declared the plaintiff entitled to compensation in respect of any injury he had suffered or would suffer.

Ostrander, J., in his judgment stated that the right of a landowner to take percolating water from under his land was a qualified one, the doctrine of reasonable user having been introduced by equity. "It is imperative," he said, "that the people of the city have water: it is not imperative that they secure it at the expense of those owning lands adjoining lands owned by their city."

In Dunbar v. Sweeney (1921), 230 N.Y., 609, a landowner diverted percolating water from a spring on adjoining land, and used the water on his cold storage and ice manufacturing plant. It was held that he had the right to "take such water as might be necessary for and incidental to the full use and enjoyment of his premises." Such enjoyment would include the use of water for refrigerating purposes and for the manufacture of ice to be used in the business, but not for the manufacture of ice for sale.

In the Californian case of the City of San Bernadino v. City of Riverside (1921), 198 P., 784, the rights of landowners whose land overlay an artesian basin were discussed. It was held that each was only entitled to a reasonable proportion of the water available, and would be restricted to such proportion by the court. It was also held, with regard to the right of riparian owners, that they are entitled to prevent the reduction of the flow of a stream by the withdrawal of the support of underground water—a decision contrary to the English case of Metropolitan Water Board v. English.

Horne v. Utah Oil Refining Company (1921), 202 P., 815, was another case in an artesian district. It was there held that the landowner was entitled to a quantity of the underground water proportionate to the area of his land, and then only if it was reasonably required for beneficial purposes in connection with his land.

In the Carolina case of Rouse v. City of Kinston (1924), 123 S.E., 482, the "reasonable use" doctrine was maintained. It was held that a landowner injured by the abstraction of percolating water for public supply was entitled to compensation. While municipalities had under the code applicable to them the right to take the water, such taking, in so far as it inflicted injury on an adjoining landowner, was an infringement of his right.

We are in this Paper considering chiefly the exploitation of underground water as a source of public supply and its results. This involves two questions:—

- (1) The effect of the operations of those who undertake that supply upon other landowners;
- (2) The effect of the operations of other landowners upon those who undertake the duty of public supply.

At the time of our last Paper attention had been focussed particularly by Lord Desborough's unsuccessful Bill upon the first of these aspects. Since then developments have tended rather in the direction of the second.

Dealing first with the protection of landowners (including other undertakers) who may be affected by the pumping operations of authorised water undertakers, it may be useful to notice some of the principal provisions conceded or obtained in Parliamentary proceedings since 1911.

This protection usually takes one of three forms:—

- (a) An obligation imposed upon the undertakers to compensate for injury caused to other supplies within a certain distance or area. The onus of proof of injury is usually (but not invariably) left upon the party injured.
- (b) Conditions imposed upon the authorised well, either as to working (limitation of quantity pumped) or as to construction (tubbing, position of adits, &c.).

- (c) The laying down of a "frontier" between two water undertakers, with a condition that neither shall abstract water on the other's side of the line.

The Ipswich Corporation Act, 1911, provides an example of two of these forms of protection. A line is drawn as between the Corporation and the Felixstowe Waterworks Company beyond which neither shall seek powers to abstract nor shall abstract water; and any wells within $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the well authorised by the Act are to be compensated if pumping at the Corporation's well causes a diminution of supply. The proof of their diminution rests with the owner of the well affected.

The Gloucester Corporation Act, 1911, contained a protective clause that combined a limitation on the quantity to be pumped at the well authorised by the Act, a condition that the well should be tubbed down to a certain depth and that no adit should be driven above a stated level, and a provision for compensation. Compensation was to be made if it could be proved that pumping at the well authorised by the Act had diminished the supply in any well or watering place within $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and proof that such supply had been effective in dry seasons since 1895, and had only diminished when pumping commenced, should be accepted as primâ facie evidence that the diminution was caused by the pumping. This clause was an agreed clause.

In the Kingston-upon-Hull Act, 1911, wells within two miles of the authorised well were protected, but the burden of proof was left upon the owners of the wells affected.

The Tendring Hundred Waterworks Act, 1912, contained a similar provision as to wells within two miles, and also a prohibition from driving adits under the River Stour. It will be remembered that, while it is illegal to extract water from a river for waterworks purposes, it is not illegal to lower the underground water level—to withdraw support from the water in the river—so that its flow is diminished. This was the effect of the case of English v. Metropolitan Water Board (1907), 1 K.B., 588, referred to in our first Paper.

In the West Gloucestershire Waterworks Act, 1914, an agreed clause provided for compensation if the supply at a particular private well was diminished by pumping at any work of the promoters within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and the onus of disproof was left upon the promoters.

The South Staffordshire Waterworks Act, 1915, contained a provision for the protection of wells within two miles of the works authorised by that Act, the onus of proof being on the owners of the wells affected. A similar protection was given to the Staffordshire and Worcestershire Canal Company. As we pointed out in our last Paper, the South Staffordshire Waterworks Act of 1909 imposed upon the Company the burden of disproving that any diminution of supply in wells, ponds or streams within $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles of works then for the first time authorised was caused by their pumping, but that Act was passed under peculiar circumstances.

This Company's Act of 1915 also provided for the tubbing of the wells then authorised so that water should not be drawn from certain strata.

The Wolverhampton Corporation Act, 1915, contained protective provisions imposed upon the Corporation after a contest. The Corporation must make good the diminution of supply in any well or spring used as a source of supply within two miles of their well if such diminution is caused by their pumping; and the burden of proving that it is not so caused is on the Corporation.

The right to compensation was extended to persons entitled to use the water of the stream into which such springs discharged although the right arose outside the two-mile radius.

This Act also provides for the lining of wells constructed under it so as to exclude water from the keuper sandstone.

The South Staffordshire Waterworks Act, 1922, provides for the protection of wells, streams or ponds within two miles of the works authorised, the onus of proof of injury being on the owners affected. The Rugeley Urban District Council opposed the Bill on the ground that their artesian supply would be affected, and, after a contest, they obtained the right to obtain a free supply equal to the amount by which their supply should be diminished unless the water company could prove that the diminution was not due to their operations.

By the Colne Valley Water Act, 1922, the promoters were prohibited, after a contest, from constructing any adit under the River Colne; and similarly under the Harpenden Water Order, 1926, no well or adit was to be constructed within 100 feet of the River Lea.

In the Thorne and District Water Order, 1926, a frontier was provided between the promoters and the Doncaster Corporation. Neither were to construct works for the abstraction of water within one mile of the boundary of their limits of supply; and Doncaster was prohibited from constructing such works within three miles of the well authorised by the Order.

The Kingston-upon-Hull Corporation Act, 1926, gave protection to wells within two miles of the proposed pumping stations, the onus of proof being on the well-owner. The London and North Eastern Railway Company succeeded in getting this protection extended to their wells which were situated outside the two-mile radius.

In our last Paper we referred to the Frimley and Farnborough District Water Act, 1909 which contained a provision for the compensation of wells affected within a radius of two miles, the onus of proof being on the owner of the well. At the same time, the quantity to be pumped was limited to one million gallons a day.

By this Company's Act of 1927 the limitation was enlarged to $1\frac{1}{2}$ million gallons a day, and the radius for compensation was increased to three miles. The Company were further placed under an obligation to provide compensation water for the Basingstoke Canal if springs in the canal within the same radius were affected. The canal water was used by the Woking Electricity and Gas Companies.

Mutual protection between two undertakers was arranged in the Westgate and Birchington Water Act, 1927. A "frontier" was laid down beyond which neither the Ramsgate Corporation (on one side) or the promoters (on the other) might construct works for abstracting water, and a maximum depth for such works was also imposed.

There have been a number of other Acts and Orders containing protective provisions that do not call for special comment. In no other cases than those mentioned has the onus of proof been placed upon the undertakers.

The general criticism may be made that, if it is equitable that compensation should be made where injury can be proved to be caused to private water supplies by the pumping operations of a statutory water undertaker, this should be the subject of general legislation, rather than be left to depend upon opposition offered to new schemes before Parliament or before the Ministry of Health.

It must, however, be remembered that the proof that any depletion of supply is due to the pumping at a particular well may be exceedingly difficult.

We have followed so far Parliamentary decisions in individual cases. The effect of extensive pumping is closely connected with the general problem of the allocation and conservation of water resources, and this has received considerable attention from commissions and committees for many years. These have consistently recommended the appointment of a Central Water Authority to take a comprehensive view of the situation, to obtain information, and to allocate supplies. Eighteen years ago we wrote: "The establishment of such a body is still an ideal of the more or less remote future." That future is even now little less remote.

The Board of Trade appointed the Water Power Resources Committee in 1918, primarily to enquire into water power for industrial purposes. This reference was enlarged in 1919 to include the consideration of "what steps should be taken to ensure that the water resources of the country are properly conserved, and fully and systematically used for all purposes."

The Committee presented in 1920 a second Interim Report which dealt with the larger question of the control of water resources generally; and this was ultimately adopted by them as containing their final conclusions. "The allocation of water," they said, "has become too serious

“ a matter to be left solely to a succession of Parliamentary Committees which are constituted from time to time to deal with particular Bills and have no continuity of existence, and which are unprovided with machinery by which schemes can be considered in relation to and co-ordinated with material resources and needs for all purposes”; and they recommended that a statutory Water Commission should be set up, charged with the general control of the allocation of water, and responsible directly to the Minister of Health. They considered and rejected the idea of departmental control, but recommended an inter-departmental committee to assist the Commission.

The Commission were to consider all proposals to take water for any purpose other than private domestic use. If they refused their consent, the promoters were to be at liberty to proceed by Private Bill; but the Commission would report to Parliament, and, if necessary, appear before the Committee on the Bill.

The Commission were to collect information and make hydrometric surveys. They were also to have the power to bring forward proposals for improving the law relating to surface and underground water. In their final Report (1921) the Committee urged the necessity of making an immediate start in the collection of information.

Mr. Sandford Fawcett, C.B., the representative of the Ministry of Health upon the Committee, while signing the Report, attached a reservation dissenting from the recommendation that a permanent Water Commission should be set up, on the ground that the allocation of water for public supplies was almost entirely a public health question, and should be performed by the Minister of Health, subject to confirmation by Parliament. He pointed out that the greater number of water supply schemes were now dealt with by the Ministry of Health, and did not reach Parliament, and that much of the necessary information was already in the hands of the Ministry. Any desirable changes could be attained by extending the powers of the Ministry and of the other Government departments involved. He agreed with a proposal that had been made by the Committee that an Advisory Committee consisting of representatives of water undertakings and other qualified persons should be set up to give advice or report on matters that would have come before the proposed Water Commission.

The recommendation of the other 24 members of the Committee that a Water Commission should be set up was not carried out. A standing Advisory Committee consisting of representatives of waterworks undertakings was set up by the Minister of Health in 1923. In the Report of the Ministry for 1922-23 the appointment of a Committee to confer with the officers of the department on questions of water supply is announced, and it is stated that the presentation of proposals for a national water policy is already under consideration by the Committee. It is also stated that the survey of water resources is proceeding.

In the Ministry's Report of the next year it is stated that there are three stages in the broad lines of policy in connection with domestic water supplies—the local, the regional, and the national. The first and third are filled by the local authorities or undertakers and the Ministry of Health respectively; the second, or regional, should be filled by regional representative committees. These regional committees would include representatives of all the local authorities of an area with common water interests, and would formulate a local water policy on definite lines in accord with general national policy.

The present view of the Ministry with regard to regional water committees is contained in the booklet issued under that title in 1928: "Demands," it stated, "are made from time to time for a national allocation of water resources. Any allocation which is to be of practical use can be made only after a great deal of investigation. The most practical course is that regional water committees should be formed by which the needs of each of the districts in a region will be ascertained and a definite policy recommended for meeting requirements. These regional findings can then be brought together, modified, where necessary, in their general interests, and in this way a national policy formulated based on fact instead of surmise." The national policy and the local policy would appear to have changed places. So far it is believed that three regional water committees have been formed.

The weak point of this organisation appears to be that a regional committee is an entirely powerless body with no administrative status. Its members are bound by no ties, and can dissociate themselves from its deliberations and recommendations at any moment. While under favourable circumstances co-operation may be achieved, as in south-west Lancashire, the authors feel that, as a basis for national policy, regional committees (when they come into existence) may lack substance, and that it may prove difficult to persuade individual undertakers to subordinate their freedom of action to decisions of the committees. Responsibility and power are usually necessary before the faculty of constructive decision is acquired by a representative body.

Reports to the Ministry from Regional Committees upon any scheme are treated as confidential, and are not disclosed to parties who may be affected by the scheme, although they are known to the promoters. This is a very undesirable system, which is entirely contrary to the usual practice at inquiries, and places opponents of the scheme at a great disadvantage.

In 1925 the Advisory Committee submitted a Report upon underground water to the Ministry. This Report was circulated for comment to (among others) this Institution. A very full memorandum was submitted to the Ministry by the Council, which will be found in Vol. V., Part 5, of the Journal at page 256, with which the authors are in cordial agreement.

The Report appears to suffer from a certain one-sidedness of view, the Advisory Committee representing solely the interests of water undertakers.

The survey of water resources has not, it is believed, got much further than the checking of returns of water authorities.

The present position is thus not that contemplated by the various Commissions and Committees who have reported on the subject. The position is, indeed, just as it was, with the addition of some committees of a purely advisory character.

A DISCUSSION took place on RIGHTS IN UNDERGROUND WATER.

Mr. C. B. FISHER, C.B.E. (President), in the Chair.

Mr. E. J. SILCOCK (Member of Council) said it gave him great pleasure to propose a vote of thanks to the authors for their Paper. They had given an interesting and comprehensive view of the existing law of underground water. Colonel Bidder had apologised for what he had called the uninteresting details of the Acts of Parliament to which he had referred, but the members knew from past experience that the lecturer had the gift of making even dry Acts of Parliament appear interesting; and they could pay him no higher compliment than to say that he had done so on the present occasion.

As compared with the American, English law had the advantage that it was more easily applied in that the determination of reasonable user in the case of a landowner might give rise to great controversy. Certainly the principle that water from an artesian source should be allocated in proportion to the area of land owned would be a most difficult one to apply.

The four main sources of the disturbance of underground water mentioned by the authors might, he thought, really be reduced to one, namely, the disturbance caused by the water undertakers. The disturbance due to mining did not in practice amount to a great deal at the present time. There were one or two cases where coal mines in this country were pumping large quantities of water which were not being fully utilised, but in the main the present mining practice was to exclude all water from the shafts when sunk. Therefore it was only during sinking operations that any serious disturbance took place, and even that was minimised to a great extent by the application of modern processes, such as cementation and freezing, for keeping water out of the shafts whilst they were being sunk. Then, again, with regard to the pumping of water by private manufactories, there were few cases where the quantity of water abstracted for such purposes was so large as seriously to interfere with the water under adjoining property. It was true that in some cases artesian bore holes were put down, particularly by private owners, and the water which was discharged at the surface was not controlled but was allowed to run to waste. To that extent it no doubt injured the water of adjoining property, but, after all, so far as this country was concerned, the areas where artesian conditions were found were exceedingly limited in extent. Therefore that again was not a very serious difficulty. It really came down to the fact that the public water undertakings were the real culprits in the matter.

The authors said it was a question as to whether or not restrictions on the taking of water should be controlled by public Acts of Parliament or by private Acts which authorised the undertaking. On the whole he thought there was a good deal to be said in favour of the present practice of having each case considered on its merits by a Parliamentary Committee, and that the protective clauses inserted in a private Bill should be designed to deal with the circumstances of the particular case. The instances which had been referred to in the Paper indicated a good deal of divergence as to the distances to which the protection was to extend. They seemed to vary from a mile up to three miles. In the Farnborough case, which was the only one where the three miles limit was reached, he imagined that the undertakers there were not shouldering a very heavy burden when they took upon themselves that restriction, because the quantity of water which they were pumping was only $1\frac{1}{2}$ million gallons a day, and the probability of their affecting water to a distance of three miles was exceedingly remote.

The Wolverhampton case in 1915 was a most important precedent, because it was the first time in which the onus of proof had been put upon the undertakers by Parliament. There had been other instances where that condition had been agreed to, but that had been the first time in which Parliament had put that onus upon the undertakers. It therefore formed a very important precedent, which no doubt might be followed to some extent in the future.

The formation of a central water authority was an ideal to which all looked forward, but it seemed as remote as ever. The Board of Trade Water Power Resources Committee in their second report had made certain recommendations which, he thought, really represented the general feeling on the subject, namely, that the Water Authority should consider all cases, but that there should be an appeal to Parliament in the form of a private Bill if they refused to sanction any particular scheme. There must surely be some appeal to Parliament whatever form of authority was set up. The alternative suggestion, viz., that control should be vested in the Ministry of Health or some other department of State was, he thought, open to strong objection, and out of accord with public feeling.

MR. G. TURVILLE BROWN (Vice-President) said it was with great pleasure that he rose to second the vote of thanks to their two old friends Colonel Bidder and Mr. Vaux Graham, who had come before them for the third time. He had read the authors' two earlier Papers as well as the one now under discussion, and they formed together a most valuable and labour-saving compendium on the subject of underground water generally.

The two earlier Papers had been read in 1907 and 1911, and he had looked through the discussions which followed in order to see if he could find any very interesting points, but he did not think there was anything of very great interest to recall. He saw, however, that some of the speakers had descended from the sublime to the ridiculous in that they had talked about water diviners and people of that sort. He did not think that that question need be revived on the present occasion, because, while some people still found the water diviner of certain use, he knew that many still threw very grave doubts on anything which the water diviners did.

In a surveyor's general experience underground water divided itself into a number of categories. In mining districts it was a nuisance, and in South Staffordshire he believed that water difficulties were the real cause of a considerable and productive mining area being abandoned. While on that subject he would like to mention a remarkable matter which had come under his notice lately, and that was how very difficult it was in a mining district to say what underground water would or would not do. In North Wales, where he had some experience in the coalfields, there was a colliery which had pumped a very large quantity of water. It had been surrounded by four or five other collieries against which no barriers had been left. There were records of workings from either side right up to the boundaries. That colliery had been closed in July, 1925, after the adjoining collieries had paid several thousand pounds a year for a number of years for the protection which that pump was supposed to afford. Everybody round about had been very much perturbed, and increased their pumping plant; but nobody, so far as could be discovered, had had to pump a single gallon more than before, although the colliery which had pumped over a million gallons a day had been closed for four years. If any gentleman in the mining profession was interested in that case he would find it reported in the Colliery Guardian and the Iron and Coal Trades Review of about a month ago.

In general practice in London one was occasionally faced with questions concerning underground water. As most of those present knew, large buildings in London were supplied by their own wells taken down into the chalk. The point at which it became a paying proposition to put down a well was of interest to a great many of the members. For instance, in The Institution's own building they hoped to be in a position to enlarge their borders in a year or two, and it would then become a burning question as to whether they should not put down their own well. There were many wells under the City of London and its environs. Those were pumping very large quantities from the chalk, with the result that he understood that the water level was continuously being lowered at a rate which was not an arithmetically progressive rate, because seasons varied a little, but, at any rate, the water level was from decade to decade being lowered. That opened up a great many questions about water rights, and would in the future open many more. For instance, the withdrawing of that water might set up what his friend Mr. Clayton called "earth movements." There had recently been some very remarkable tides during the past two or three years in the Thames. It was an important question whether the withdrawing of support by the lowering of the average level of underground water was not having some effect on the surface by causing earth movements, which in their turn had affected deep foundations in London, and our river walls—even the sea walls—at the mouth of the Thames. He was perhaps entering rather into the realm of speculation, but it was possible there might be something in that point, and if it could be proved, or were even arguable, it would give rise to important problems affecting rights in underground water.

The country practitioner did not ordinarily have to deal with water schemes of any magnitude, especially those which derived their supply from underground water; but the ordinary case of supply from wells and springs was always of interest to them. The demand for water, especially for small communities, such as a country house with a few cottages round it, was becoming very insistent indeed. The quantities which a country house required now were enormous compared with what it wanted 10, 15 or 20 years ago, owing to the number of fresh calls made for water, such as baths, motor-washing, gardens, &c. That was the problem with which an ordinary surveyor was faced rather than those affecting the rights of great rival communities which were dealt with by Acts of Parliament.

In conclusion he desired to express the hope that the members would again see the authors before them on some future occasion, and that they would be able to avail themselves of their aid whenever the occasion arose.

Mr. W. J. JEEVES, K.C. (Associate), said he was glad to have the opportunity of thanking Mr. Vaux Graham and Colonel Bidder. The authors were to be very much congratulated on having put in a very clear way the questions which arose in the important matter of water supply. The authors stated in their Paper that the problem which arose was that it was possible to disturb underground water conditions with such violence as to inflict serious injury upon persons who had relied for their supplies upon the existing state of affairs. It was not merely a case of persons who were relying for their supplies on the existing state of affairs, but it was a case of persons who had relied on the support which underground waters had been affording to the premises which they had built on land which had remained stable for a number of years, and in regard to which it might ultimately be found that the stability had been due to the underground water not having been disturbed.

But supposing that it was disturbed? Unless it could be shown that not merely water was being taken from under that land, but water impregnated with silt, or something in the nature of earth of that kind, there was no remedy. There had been a very serious question at Watford as to whether the damage caused to houses there—damage so severe as to make it a question as to whether or not they were safe to live in—had not been entirely due to the pumping of public water undertakings. He thought there was much to be said for the argument that the damage was due to that fact. But supposing one had been able to prove that, then the difficulty would have been to show that the undertakings had taken other than the underground water in which it had been held there were no rights.

The latter was another serious question, and although he was certainly one of those Englishmen who were not at all keen to learn from America, he was not sure that some of the American decisions with regard to the matter of water supply might not usefully be applied here. In that connection he would instance the American judge who had said—and he did not think any English judge could have talked greater sense—“it is imperative that the people of the city have water; it is not imperative that they secure it at the expense of those owning lands adjoining lands owned by their city.” Personally he was not at all sure that in that statement there was not very largely a settlement of all the vexed questions which had arisen. If the needs of the community required the utilisation of underground water so that the house which a man had bought with great difficulty, after years of labour, was let down, it seemed reasonable that he should be compensated, because, after all, he was entitled to consider that the original conditions would continue, and that if they were subsequently upset for the good of the public, then he should receive compensation.

way in which the Americans had applied the English law to their own conditions. On the point of reasonableness of user, and so on, there were limits. He was not saying that he should take everything which the Americans had done; but they had dealt with the matter in a reasonably practical way having regard to the differing conditions of their country. That seemed to him clear, and he thought possibly something might be learned from the Americans in that respect.

When it came to the question of what happened in this country, he mistrusted any proposal to add to departmental authority. He was not at all inclined to add to the powers of a Government department in regard to water supply, and his feelings were the same with regard to an ad hoc Central Authority. That might be, and in some cases was, an improvement on departmental authority; but, after all, it was only a matter of degree, for an authority even of the latter kind would be answerable to nobody in the sense that Parliament was answerable to the community.

The authors' suggestion of a Regional Committee was a proposal also with which he was not in accord. He thought much good would be gained by having an exhaustive survey of water made so that its results were at the disposal of the promoters of any Bill, and could be put before a Parliamentary Committee. He thought, too, it would be of value to have a Regional Committee which could report authoritatively on the provision of water supplies in their region, on the possibility of further development, on existing and future needs; but there again, he would not like to give such a body absolute power. He thought the central survey and the reports of Regional Committees should be submitted to a Committee of Parliament and to Members of Parliament who had no axe to grind but desired only to serve public ends. He did not recommend the granting of absolute powers to any body whatever unless definite powers of veto and criticism was retained by Parliament.

He ended, as he had begun, by congratulating his friends upon what was really an extremely practical Paper, because it did focus in a very clear way the actual questions which one came up against, and it also focussed the exact position in this matter or in that at which anyone who had to deal with the question had to look. The authors had rendered a very definite public service in giving to The Institution a very clear exposition of the situation up to date.

Mr. G. PARKER PEARSON, M.INST.C.E. (Professional Associate), said that the authors' summary of cases well illustrated the general practice of to-day, and although there were no Parliamentary enactments on the subject of underground water, the findings were based on mutual advantage and common-sense, and were supported by private Acts. There was much to be said in favour of the law of this country not laying down any dictum in regard to underground water; it followed consistently the custom of generations that evidence was the foundation of judgments. Engineers, geologists and others might give opinions, but their evidence could not be supported by definite proof, for the causes of abstraction of underground water, either by pumping or by other means, could never be more than assumed. That certain effects were probable in some cases might be fairly predicated for a certain period, but changes of "flow" might arise, which the man on the top could know nothing about. Extraordinary wet or dry seasons might affect the subterranean conditions, as also might earth tremors, or sub-ground changes, and the more thought that was given to the question of the law of underground water the sounder appeared the present practice in this country. The question of setting up a statutory Water Commission with powers over the water supplies presented at first sight much to support it, had there been any series of hardships or sufferings up to the present time which were not met by existing arrangements. He, for one, thought not.

Then again, it was assumed that a statutory Water Commission would have powers over all the developed and undeveloped water supplies of the country. What extraordinary complexities they would have to deal with! Water undertakers; local authorities, some with Parliamentary powers, some only under the Public Health Acts ; statutory and non-statutory companies ; private owners supplying from a single house to large estates, comprising villages, hamlets, &c. ; industrial undertakings, some using enormous volumes of water taken from their own supplies ; water rights purchased, acquired by custom, or acquired by charters, some over 1,000 years old ; water rights leased, or given for limited periods, or in perpetuity, and that by no means exhausted the list. The present state of affairs might be open to improvement ; but it seemed doubtful if a statutory Water Commission was needed in this country, and if one were set up, he thought that they would be faced with problems which the judgment of Solomon could not unravel.

Mr. C. H. J. CLAYTON (Visitor) said he was grateful to Colonel Bidder because he had that evening lifted a load which had lain on his conscience ever since he had worked under that now venerable lady D.O.R.A. It had been part of his duty in the days of the war to put up saw-milling machinery in various parts of the country. He had tried as far as possible to put up his saw-mills as near to standing woods in order to save long hauls of timber to the mill. The first thing necessary had been to get water for the steam boilers. In one case the wood had been at the top of a hill about 800 feet high, and like the storied Jack and Jill, he had gone up the hill to try to find some water. He had found some distance up the hill a spring bursting out which had been fed through a pipe into a stone tank which, in turn, had fed another pipe, supplying the rectory in the village below. He had to get water for the boiler, so he sank the shaft just outside the stone wall, and got his water, but that, in effect, dried up the spring for the rectory. That had lain on his conscience ever since, but Colonel Bidder had lifted the load from his mind, as he had said there was no property in underground water. He had thought he had been a robber and now found he was not.

A great deal had been said with regard to the recommendations of the Water Power Resources Committee. His friend Mr. Jeeves, democrat as he was, was against setting up another departmental authority; he was in favour of matters being threshed out before Parliamentary Committees. Personally he thought the following about the recommendations contained in the Second Interim Report of the Water Power Resources Committee,—that there were so many interests which water might subserve, and so many conflicting influences which might tend to divert the purpose of any given body of persons or undertakers, that it was desirable, in the interests of all, for all questions to be taken into consideration by an unprejudiced set of persons. Departmental officials, like Members of Parliament, had no axes to grind. Their consideration of questions was entirely dispassionate.

When a Royal Commission on Land Drainage was set up they considered land drainage alone and reported on it alone; but before that Royal Commission had finished taking evidence, another Committee on Rivers Pollution was set up. A little while previously a Committee on Subsidence due to mining operations had been appointed. Then another Committee was set up to consider a water undertaking for a city, and so on. Water might subserve so many purposes that, in his opinion, one could, either by holding up water or letting down water, have such questions in conflict as drainage, navigation, the generation of power, pollution, fisheries, and half a dozen other things. If there was a corporation who desired to set up a hydro-electric plant, they wanted to dam up water so as to take power from the river, and possibly cause flooding in the process. There might be another corporation which desired to sink deep wells and to provide a plentiful water supply for the city, and so deprive others of water in the soil.

Certainly a water survey was needed, but the question was whether all those concrete proposals ought not to be considered in correlation by a perfectly impartial departmental authority, and then, if it was desired, take the results to Parliament, when the officials could be cross-examined. He thought there was a very great deal to be said for the recommendation contained in the Second Interim Report of the Water Powers Resources Committee, namely, that there should be a co-ordinating authority to consider the uses of water for all purposes. It had been stated that night that there was no property in underground water. There was what in effect amounted to robbery in some places, because some people were deprived of water. Then there was a question of abstracting the water content from the soil to such an extent as to give rise to subsidences in buildings and other structures.

Mr. E. WITTON BOOTH, M.B.E. (Fellow), said that the members owed in a most unique way their thanks to the authors whose present Paper was the third of a series, two earlier Papers having been read in 1907 and 1911. He did not know of any text-book which treated so thoroughly of underground water as did Mr. Shiress Will's Paper of 1900, followed by the three which the present authors had delivered. Those who had studied the four Papers mentioned would have noticed the changes which had taken place in the evolution of the subject. Mr. Shiress Will dealt not only with underground water as between public waterworks undertakers and private landowners, but also as between different landowners. It was interesting to note, however, that although there had been no change in the law as far as underground water between individuals was concerned, nowadays practical problems arose mostly as between waterworks undertakers and landowners. In his opinion that justified the authors of the Paper devoting themselves mostly to this latter phase of the subject.

On one point in the Paper he would like to ask for further information. Could the authors say on what principle (if any) the radius of the areas of compensation for damage was arrived at? Thus, in one case there was a one-mile radius, in another three miles. It was well known that when pumping operations took place at a well, especially if those pumping operations were considerable, there was set up on the underground water level a cone of depression. The shape of the area of that cone of depression had been a matter of considerable argument.

It was evident, however, that in most of the instances mentioned in the Paper the area of compensation was taken as circular, that is, it was defined by a radius, but it was held by some that the true area is more nearly egg-shaped, in other words, a semi-circle and a semi-ellipse on opposite sides of the same base, with the semi-ellipse on the flow-away or down-stream side (see the Holderness water case mentioned on page 375 of the authors' last Paper). Be that as it may, however, he noticed that if the site were one rich in underground water, that was to say, if the normal or rest level of water in the well was resumed fairly readily after pumping operations, the cone of depression for normal pumping would be correspondingly smaller. That, therefore, would seem to indicate that on that basis the area of compensation under such circumstances would be also smaller, and, of course, the converse when the exactly opposite conditions applied. He did not think that usually there would be any difficulty in being able to locate damage to wells within the area of the cone of depression; in fact, their presence in that area almost presupposed damage; but what was the effect when the private wells in question were outside that area? Would not damage thereto be somewhat remote, and in any case difficult to prove?

With regard to the question of compensation, it might be asked (1) Who would be the claimants (2); What would be the nature of their claims? He would take first and for the sake of argument claims arising relative to farms. In practice most of the wells where heavy pumping took place were either in or on the fringe of urban areas and therefore where farm properties were gradually diminishing; and it was an easy matter under such circumstances also to compensate for any loss by a supply of additional water from the mains.

The various private Water Acts which had been cited in regard to compensation specifically mentioned wells, but it was only the South Staffordshire Waterworks Acts which provided in terms also for the protection of "streams," and the Wolverhampton Act, 1915, added "springs," which in most cases would be the source of the stream.

It should be remembered, however, that many streams had flows to-day far less than was normal in years gone by. Many causes had been operating for many years to reduce those flows quite apart from waterworks extractions, and surely the only liability for damage to be borne by any waterworks authority under a special Act should be such as could be limited to their pumping operations. The difficulty arose in distinguishing between the various causes of such depreciation in flow and in estimating the burden of liability to be borne by each, so that the compensation payable by the waterworks undertakers could be calculated.

The Croydon area of the River Wandle was merely an illustration of the above. Before pumping operations began at the waterworks which gave rise to the passing of the River Wandle Protection Act, 1908, the flow from the springs at the source was about $1\frac{1}{4}$ million gallons per day, but there were old records of what purported to be normal flows of 4 to 5 million gallons per day, and, indeed, those were confirmed by the original area of the channels.

Surely in such circumstances it would be unjust that a waterworks authority should be mulcted in damages for the whole outlay arising on the depletion of flow, when in fact only a small proportion thereof could reasonably be said to arise from pumping operations by them. It was not difficult to see that there might be very considerable claims in regard to matters of that kind arising on streams, far more, indeed, than one would expect in the ordinary way from private wells.

In the authors' Paper of 1907 the following statement was made: "The knowledge of underground water conditions was constantly improving, while the ever-increasing demand for water renders the existing anomalies more and more burdensome."

It was well known that in the taking of records of water levels from which the directions of flow of underground water had to be estimated or deduced, the only means available were such old private wells as existed and were available in the particular area. Mostly those wells were on farms or on private estates, and many of them lay on the fringe of urban districts, where during recent years developments and building operations had been advancing considerably, and as a result many of those wells, valuable from the standpoint of underground water records, had been destroyed. That was particularly apparent in certain parts of the Greater London area, as, for instance, the confluence of valleys at Coulsdon and Purley to the south of London.

Thus, when increased population made the need for water more urgent, the opportunities of obtaining information for increasing the supply were growing less. He did not know whether the authors were still prepared to say that the knowledge of underground water conditions was constantly improving, but he ventured to think, under such circumstances as exist to-day, that after 22 years they might wish to qualify the words he had quoted.

Dr. H. LAPWORTH (Visitor) said he was diffident in rising at such a late hour, and he was practically in agreement with everything Mr. Silcock had said. Personally he strongly approved the formation of a central water commission. He had given evidence before the Water Powers Resources Committee on behalf of the Institution of Water Engineers, and the British Water Works Association had also given evidence in favour of a central authority. Many other bodies had also done the same, and he believed the desire was practically unanimous. His own feeling about the matter was that, good as was present practice in the Parliamentary Committee-rooms, there were two faults. The main one was that each Water Bill which came before a Parliamentary Committee was merely discussed on its own merits and purely with reference to the particular district concerned. The general question—the regional question—was not entered into at all. Secondly, he objected on principle to technical evidence being taken and analysed by lay men. Although that was part of his own work he did not think it was right in principle, and he thought it wrong that lay committees should give decisions on technical matters.

The question of detail, such as Mr. Jeeves referred to, as to whether any matters should ultimately come before a Parliamentary Committee, was quite another thing. But in every Water Bill which went before Parliament, and which concerned underground waters, one had to start every time ab initio, explaining to the Committee all about underground water, cones of depression, and the effects of pumping. Each separate Committee had to be educated in the matter. It was all done in a hurry, and the decision was a haphazard one. There was a tendency for things to be crystallised, which was wholly wrong in technical matters.

Again, the matter of radius of influences was a most complicated one. No attention was paid, as a rule, in any of the Parliamentary Committees as to the amount of water which had to be pumped—which was a very vital factor. In the United States it had been proved that the effects of pumping were felt up to five miles away, when 20 million gallons a day were being pumped. Yet a Parliamentary Committee would give a common radius of protection, two miles being usual whether pumping was at the rate of 500,000 gallons or 4,000,000 gallons a day.

The last point was the question of damage by private wells. There was no remedy at present against that. It was true that on the whole much damage had not been done by private wells, but there were certain exceptions. There was one case where a colliery company by its pumping took all the underground water away from a local water company's well. Then it sold the water back to the Water Company. Later, when another water authority came for a well in the same district, it opposed that Bill, and was able to use its influence to prevent the Bill being passed because it might affect their supply of water which they had in fact stolen from another company.

The PRESIDENT, in putting the vote of thanks to the meeting, referred to the service which the authors of the Paper, with their great qualifications for speaking on the subject, had now and in the past rendered The Institution by presenting such valuable information in so concise a form.

Personally he hoped that when any legislation took place in consequence of recommendations of the Royal Commission on Land Drainage, the urban population would realise and be grateful for the advantages of using not only the water in their own immediate district, but for having available also that brought from other watersheds as well. As a matter of fact, he believed that in no case had any public water authority supplying urban districts paid anything for the water itself, apart from the cost of impounding it in reservoirs and the pipes which carried it. Whereas in the olden days, when the population had been much less, the big towns had been able to draw their water from wells in their own district, now they had to go outside their district and obtain water which fell perhaps on their watershed, and which they were capable, by legislation, to claim a right to use. He thought that when any legislation took place in connection with drainage, those who had the benefit of the water and at the same time could dispose of the water which they did not want—and water very often in a contaminated form—without any extra payment, should be asked to contribute their fair share towards the cleaning out of the rivers of this country. That would be a question which was wrapped up in the matter of the supply of water as well.

The members were very indebted to the authors, who had brought before them concisely all the cases which had been recently decided—at any rate since eighteen years ago. The members would look upon the present Paper as one containing the history of the water supply of this country.

The vote of thanks was then put, and carried with acclamation.

Colonel BIDDER, in acknowledging the vote, said that the assurance that they were always welcome at The Institution was a very great privilege both to himself and to Mr. Vaux Graham.

The meeting then terminated.

From Mr. CECIL H. BAILEY (Fellow)—

The Institution is laid under an obligation to the authors for bringing this matter up and enabling the members to express their individual views. It is a question which is bound to become more urgent as time goes on, and members should consider how the various interests which they represent may be affected if at any time proposals are made for an alteration of the law.

So far the matter appears to have been dealt with, as the authors say, in a one-sided manner, and interests which may be affected do not appear to be taken into the confidence of the Ministry of Health.

Mining is stated to be the principal activity which causes damage and threatens to cause further damage to water supplies.

No doubt in certain areas, under certain circumstances, underground water supplies have been damaged and even destroyed by mining operations; the South Staffordshire district is an example of that. On the other hand we are beginning to see the limits of mining in this country, and it may quite reasonably be said that mining operations in future will be carried on with less threat to water resources than they have in the past.

No one contemplates pumping large quantities of water out of a shaft in the course of sinking at the present time. Cementation is almost universally applied by which means water is prevented from running away into a shaft to any great extent.

In the course of working coal or other mineral it may happen that underground supplies are tapped by the breaking of the rocks between the mineral being worked and the water-bearing rocks above. No mineowner wants this to happen, and the most rigid precautions are taken to prevent it. An occurrence of this kind is likely to be much more disastrous to the mineowner than to the water interests on the surface.

The Advisory Committee to the Ministry of Health made elaborate suggestions to provide for contingencies arising from the sinking of shafts and boreholes, but no provisions whatever are put forward to deal with the difficulties which may be caused by the workings underground.

It would hardly be possible for a general supervision of underground operations to be undertaken, or that these operations should be subject to interference from people interested in water supplies above.

Most mineowners are already under an obligation to surface-owners and occupiers to provide alternative water supply should their workings destroy or cause diminution to the supplies existing before the minerals are worked. It would, however, be a serious matter for the mining community if the mineowners were in general asked to undertake responsibility for water supplies, especially where large quantities are pumped by a public supply undertaking.

There are many points in the 1925 report of the Advisory Committee which require careful consideration.

The procedure which is suggested is cumbersome, and might lead to serious delays, and it would be simpler to prohibit the sinking of shafts in certain prescribed areas unless the process of cementation or other means of excluding water from the shaft is adopted. This ought not to be a hardship, as where the strata contain large supplies of water, cementation would almost certainly be adopted. The person, however, who contemplates sinking a shaft should be given the right to apply to the Ministry of Mines or Ministry of Health for leave to do without cementation.

"Tubbing" a shaft is not sufficient protection for water supply, as a process of "tubbing" does not exclude water while sinking is going on.

It is possible to deplete the water supply over a large area for a number of years if a shaft is sunk and subsequently sealed by tubbing.

So far as the existing law is concerned, the crux of the whole matter is surely the difficulty of proving connection between one underground source and another.

Surveyors who have experience in mining areas know that a drought will always produce claims for depleted wells, and most cases of damaged or depleted water supply have to be decided on the point as to whether or not the supply varied beyond certain limits before the mineral workings were in existence.

It is possible for the underground water level to be disturbed without water appearing in the underground workings, for it is possible that the impervious stratum holding up the water may be broken, and the water still held up by a lower impervious stratum which is not sufficiently broken to allow the water to pass.

It may be useful to summarise the different ways in which mining may affect underground supplies:—

1. By boring—

- (a) An impervious stratum may be pierced, and water held up by it may run away into lower strata not already waterlogged.
- (b) A borehole left open may subsequently be tapped underground by workings, and water from an overlying rock may run into the workings.
- (c) A borehole may tap a water-bearing rock at a level which will cause the water to overflow and possibly diminish the supply of water in the rock at higher levels.

2. By shaft sinking, where cementation or tubbing is not resorted to.

3. By disturbance of rocks overlaying the coal or mineral which allows the water to run away.

From Mr. HAROLD OXLEY (Surveyor to the Metropolitan Water Board)—

It would seem to be clear that, largely owing to the lack of defined rights or property in underground water, the services of a surveyor are not likely to be required by land-owners to measure the loss or damage suffered by the abstraction of underground water by neighbouring land-owners. Perhaps this is just as well, because if general legislation were introduced imposing conditions such as are sometimes imposed upon authorised undertakers, namely, that the latter must prove that the abstraction of underground water by them does not adversely affect the level of water in an adjoining well upon the property of another, such legislation would appear, at first glance, to set the surveyor the problem of proving a negative.

Happily, perhaps, this part of the business could be delegated to the engineer or geologist. The question of proof of damage is one of the greatest difficulty, as was exemplified in a recent application to Parliament by authorised undertakers whose experts were convinced that the underground water flowed in a certain direction, whereas the experts of the opponents were equally convinced that it flowed in the opposite direction. In that case the direction of the flow of underground water was of vital importance, but I am not sure that either convinced anybody that there was a flow at all.

The learned authors drew attention to one matter of great importance when they alluded to the extra or additional burdens imposed on authorised or statutory undertakers as compared with ordinary landowners. Apparently there is nothing to prevent an owner of land adjoining a statutory well from sinking a well on his land in such a manner as might seriously affect the supply in the former. That is surely wrong, and equal protection should be afforded to all parties if protection is to be afforded at all.

In rural areas, and where land is of comparatively low value, undertakers can and do protect themselves within the limits of their powers by buying considerable areas of land adjoining their wells, and so protecting the underground reservoir; but in urban areas this course is much too costly.

The divergence of American practice from our own is most interesting, and if the definition of "land" in the Lands Clauses Acts were amended to include underground water, we should probably see claims for compensation for injurious affection brought by landowners under Section 68 of the Act against statutory undertakers. On the other hand an amendment of the existing common law by general legislation would probably be strenuously opposed by brewery proprietors, amongst others, who frequently use underground water for trade purposes, and one of their grounds of opposition would doubtless be that the "drys" would thereby attain their object by somewhat unconstitutional methods.

Reference has been made to the case of English v. Metropolitan Water Board. Colonel English owned and occupied a large house, together with about 7 acres of land adjoining; the house was supplied with water by a well about 30 or 40 feet deep. Along the eastern side of his land ran a shallow stream about 8 or 9 feet wide, which formed the boundary between his land and that of the Water Board, upon which there was a well from which water was abstracted and supplied to consumers.

Colonel English complained that pumping at the Board's well reduced the level of water in the stream, and so prevented him from using it as a trout hatchery. The stream was about 120 yards from the Water Board's well, and about 300 yards from the well which supplied his house with water; the distance from the latter to the Water Board's well was about 350 yards.

As mentioned by the learned authors of the Paper, Colonel English's claim failed, and it is worthy of note that Lord Alverstone, C.J., said " . . . I have come to the conclusion that although the defendants [the Water Board] are not expressly protected by statute, no action can be maintained against them by the plaintiff [Colonel English] in respect of the abstraction of water. I have only to add that had I taken another view of the case, it clearly is not in my opinion one for injunction. The damage occasioned by the abstraction of water in the past is comparatively trifling, and under no circumstances should I have assessed the damages for its abstraction at more than £50." This case had a somewhat interesting sequel; Colonel English sold his property to the Water Board, from whom he took a lease and resided on the premises. At the end of his lease he gave up possession, and the house stood empty for some time. During the war it was used as a hostel, and housed 50 or 60 workers at a neighbouring munition factory. They obtained their water from Colonel English's old well, when I took particular care to note what effect, if any, pumping at the adjoining Board's well had upon the water in the well at the house. Possibly because there was a good rainfall during the years in question, or possibly for other reasons, I was quite unable to find that any diminution of water occurred in the well or streams surrounding the house even at the time of maximum pumping from the Board's well.

In 1907, shortly after the commencement of the action referred to, the Board promoted a Bill to obtain power to purchase lands by agreement for the purpose of protecting any source of water supply from pollution or for any other purpose of their undertaking. Reference was made by the Lord Chairman of Committees to the recent case in which the Board had exercised their common law rights of sinking a well upon lands which they had acquired and this without express Parliamentary sanction. The Lord Chairman, after intimating that the matter had received the careful consideration of several of the Government departments, stated that in their view wells should not be sunk by large water undertakings supplying water for general public use in pursuance of their common law rights, but that such wells and the power to abstract water in large quantities should, in the case of water authorities, first be specifically authorised by Parliament. The Lord Chairman inserted a model form of clause in the Board's Act, which had the effect of preventing the Board, without first obtaining the authority of Parliament, from sinking wells on any lands which they might hereafter acquire for the purpose of their undertaking, although it does not prevent them from exercising their common law rights of sinking wells on lands which they have already acquired before the passing of this Act.

I believe this clause is now inserted in the Acts of all water undertakers, so that it may be said that owners of lands adjoining the lands of water undertakers have a large measure of protection even under the existing law.

It would add to our gratitude to the learned authors of the very interesting Paper if they would particularise the nature of the legislation which they think is required to confer rights in underground water to the landowner.

THE ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING,

THE SIXTY-FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.

ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING,
Monday, 27th May, 1929.

The outstanding event in the sixtieth year of The Institution's existence was the celebration of its Diamond Jubilee in June, the occasion being specially marked by the presence of His Royal Highness the Duke of York at the Banquet held, by the courtesy of the Lord Mayor of London and the City Lands Committee, in the historic Guildhall on the actual anniversary of The Institution's foundation. The Council wish to take this opportunity of recording the indebtedness of The Institution to His Royal Highness for the honour accorded to members and the profession by his presence on that occasion. For the second time within recent years members had the honour of welcoming a son of The Institution's Royal Patron at an official function, and his interest in their work and activities, as shown by His Royal Highness' speech, was a source of pleasure to the large number present.

A report of the Celebrations has already appeared in the Journal, but the Council feel it their duty again to express their gratitude to the Chairman and members of the City Lands Committee for the use of the Guildhall, to His Majesty's Office of Works, to their hosts at the various places of interest visited, to the Diamond Jubilee Committee, and the many others who so ably and unselfishly assisted in making the celebrations the success they were. The friendly messages of congratulation received from numerous kindred societies in England and abroad were also deeply appreciated.

The Council are sure that every member of The Institution will join with them in thankfulness for His Majesty's sure, if slow, recovery from his grievous illness, and the hope that he may yet be spared in health and strength long to reign over his subjects.

At the end of last session Mr. J. A. Rutherford and Mr. Walter Lawrance found it necessary to retire from the Council to the great regret of their colleagues. The Council must place on record their gratitude to both these gentlemen for the ungrudging and tireless service they gave to The Institution during their years of office.

Membership.

The customary tables showing the statistics of membership to date in a comparative form are given below :—

The toll exacted by death during the year is again a heavy one, and includes many names of note in the profession. Special mention must be made of the Right Hon. George F. Stewart (Past-President), Mr. Henry Hartley and Mr. G. C. Smyth Richards, O.B.E. (Past Members of the Council), and the following, whose connection with The Institution had been of longest standing : Mr. Henry Jonas, London (1869); Mr. J. L. Hawker, Bournemouth (1891); Mr. Henry York, London (1891); and Mr. R. E. Maunsell, Dublin (1895) (a Past-Chairman of the Irish Branch).

The Institution have also lost three distinguished Honorary Members by the death of the Most Hon. the Marquess of Lincolnshire, K.G., G.C.M.G., the Right Hon. the Earl Howe, G.C.V.O., and Mr. Justice Clavell Salter. Obituary notices of these and other well-known members have appeared in the Journal during the session, and the Council are sure that members will join with them in sympathy towards those bereaved and share in the sense of loss which The Institution and the profession sustains in their death.

Finance.

Leaving out of account all capital expenditure in connection with the decoration of the Lecture Hall, which, it will be remembered, was carried out last year as a memorial of the Diamond Jubilee of The Institution, the year ended with a balance in hand of £855; total receipts from all sources being measured against total expenditure for that purpose. This credit balance, however, is only obtained by encroaching to the extent of £454 on the receipts from the entrance fees of new members which amounted to £1,309, and which in the opinion of the Council should be treated as capital and invested for such purposes as and when required. Such a statement would appear to indicate an unsatisfactory financial position in the absence of any explanation to the contrary. Special circumstances of an unusual and non-recurring nature, however, occurred in 1928 which throw a somewhat different light on the position: two payments in respect of corporation duty, each of £215, one at the beginning and one at the end of the year, happened to be made in 1928; the "Standard Method of Measurement" was republished at a cost of £390, an amount which will be reimbursed as the copies are issued, and the index to the Journal, which is published every five years and cost £272, fell within the year. Had it not been for these payments, two of which are either wholly non-recurring or will be reimbursed, no encroachment on the receipts from the entrance fees of new members would have been necessary and a more substantial balance would have been shown.

The Examinations.

The task of the Education Committee in working out the details, including a complete revision of the Syllabus, connected with the reorganisation of the professional examinations referred to in the last Annual Report, proved heavier than expected, but it is hoped that particulars of the new scheme will be available shortly for issue to teaching bodies and candidates intending to present themselves in 1932 or later.

The degree in Estate Management granted by the University of Cambridge has been recognised by the Council as exempting holders in toto from the professional examinations. This concession was made having regard to the merits of the course of instruction provided at Cambridge, and follows the precedent previously set up in the case of the B.Sc. degree in Estate Management, University of London.

The Preliminary Examination of the Faculty of Surveyors of Scotland and the South African Matriculation Board Certificate and Exemption Certificate have been added to the list of scholastic examinations accepted in lieu of The Institution Preliminary.

A Julian Rogers Scholarship, the foundation of which had been provided for in the will of the first Secretary of The Institution, will in future be awarded to the candidate placed first in the Preliminary Examination, to be used by whom 21 entered for the Intermediate, 13 for the Final, 1 for the Direct Fellowship, 1 for the Special Degree Holders' Examination, and 7 for the Typical Subjects only. Of these, 30 satisfied the examiners, while 8 were referred back in Typical Subjects.

Four candidates sat in Dublin for the Final Examination, and of these 3 were successful.

The Special Diploma Examinations.

Twelve candidates presented themselves in June for the Special Diploma Examination in Rating, which continues to be the most popular of the five diploma subjects. Of these, six were successful, namely, Mr. David Evans, Mr. Arthur Gadd, Mr. W. Jennens Hackett, M.B.E., Mr. Allan Kirk, Mr. A. H. London, and Mr. John Stephen. None of the other Special Diploma Examinations were held, the number of entries being less than that required by the rules in a non-triennial year. In 1929, however, all the examinations will be held irrespective of the number of entries.

The Examiners.

The examiners' task this year was again a heavy one, and the sincere thanks of the Council are due to them for the efficiency with which they have carried out their onerous and responsible duties. There have been a number of changes in personnel, due, in each case, to retirement. Mr. N. J. Hodgkinson replaced Mr. H. G. B. Wyatt in Copy-holds, and Mr. Witton Booth, M.B.E., Mr. William Allen in Arbitration; Mr. W. Murray Harris takes the Intermediate Lower Paper in Quantities, vice Mr. A. W. Davson, who follows Mr. Henry Vale as examiner in the higher Paper; Mr. Henry Riley succeeds Mr. E. H. Selby in Analysis of Pricing; the Report Papers in Sub-Divisions I. and II. are taken respectively by Mr. D. A. Rawlence and Mr. E. W. Eason, vice Mr. C. H. Sample, O.B.E., and Mr. A. C. Driver; Iron and Timber Roofs by Mr. W. H. Overton, who replaces Mr. G. H. Lovegrove; and Valuations (Non-Typical) Final Examination by Mr. Dryland Haslam, vice Mr. W. Townend, who follows Mr. W. Selves Walker as examiner in the typical subject for candidates in the Final, Sub-Division II.

The Institution Scholarships.

Fifteen candidates, an increase of four on last year, entered for the competitive examination held in January for the first time under the new rules referred to in the last Annual Report. The successful candidates were: Mr. L. A. Wade (Cotham Secondary School, Bristol) and Mr. H. E. Stopher (Westminster City School).

The scholarships were founded in order to attract each year into the profession a number of men possessing high educational attainments. The four previously offered have now been reduced to two, and their value increased to meet the greatly enhanced cost of advanced education, especially at Oxford and Cambridge. They are tenable for three years at any British University in a course of study approved by the Council as being of advantage to a surveyor's education, holders being required to enter the profession in due course, and to present themselves for The Institution examinations. The value of the scholarships depends on whether the holder elects to go to Oxford or Cambridge or to one of the newer Universities, and amounts in the former case to £130 per annum and £100 in the latter.

The College of Estate Management.

In the recent professional examinations, out of the 250 candidates, including those from Scotland and Ireland, who were successful in the Intermediate, and the 270 who passed the Final, 167 and 189 respectively were prepared by the College, as were three out of the five candidates who passed the Special Single Examination for degree-holders and the two successful in the Direct Fellowship. Nine Institution prizes and medals were awarded to College students.

The Publications.

The following Papers were read and discussed at Ordinary General Meetings during the session:—

Date.	Subject of Paper.	Author.
1928.
June 14...	Sixty Years of The Institution	The Secretary.
Nov. 12...	The Opening Address ...	The President.

Jan. 7 ...	Some Notes on the Charing Cross Bridge Problem	A. Norman Garrard (Hon. Secretary).
Feb. 4 ...	The Significance of the Timber Merchant in Estate Forestry	H. J. Vaughan, M.A., B.Sc. (Professional Associate).
March 4	Recent Developments in Town Planning	F. Longstreth Thompson (Fellow).

May 6 ...	Underground Water... ..	H. F. Bidder, D.S.O., B.A., and W. Vaux Graham, M.I.C.E. (Associates).

The attendance of members at these meetings has been satisfactory, and the discussions valuable and instructive. The Council feel it their duty to place on record their indebtedness, both to the lecturers and those who by studying the Papers read, and bringing out their views in discussion, have added to the value of the meetings.

There has been no piece of legislation this session of such importance to the profession as to call for the issue to members of a special Memorandum similar to those issued in recent years. Ten years having now elapsed since the war, the present is perhaps a suitable occasion to give a list of the Memoranda prepared by the Council during that period and issued to members. They are as follows :—

The Agriculture Act, 1920.

The Rent, &c., Restrictions Act, 1920.

The Rent, &c., Restrictions Act, 1923.

Town Planning Acts (1909 to 1919).

The Tithe Act, 1925.

The Rating and Valuation Act, 1925.

The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927.

Members requiring new or extra copies may still obtain them at The Institution on payment of a small charge.

In the Journal every endeavour has been made to satisfy the needs of each branch of the profession, and, in addition to news of a domestic character, papers and articles on matters of current professional interest have appeared. In this connection the Council would remind members that suggestions whether for Papers to be read at Ordinary Meetings or for articles in the Journal—which should be as concise as possible—are always welcomed.

The Library and Collections.

The additions made to the Library during the year includes a number of new works and new editions of standard reference books. Among the former may be mentioned a luxuriously produced volume of measured drawings of St. Paul's Cathedral by A. F. E. Poley, while the latter include the newly published fourteenth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. Maps and particulars of town planning schemes already approved by the Minister of Health are also, with the courteous assistance of the authorities concerned, being collected and filed. Those already received include Rochdale, Luton, Croydon, Margate, Hull, and Ruislip-Northwood, and the series will be enlarged as other schemes become effective. For the gift of a copy of Aggas' Map of London and Westminster (1540), re-cut by Virtue in 1737, showing all the principal buildings in elevation, the Council are indebted to Mr. Leslie Vigers (Past-President).

The exhibits in the Forestry Museum continue to increase, and those added during the year include several illustrating fungal disease and damage by insect pests. Through the courtesy of the Director of the Forest Products Research Laboratory at Princes Risborough, a complete set of examples showing how timber is tested has been presented to The Institution, and may be seen in the Museum. The forest tool and implement section now includes a timber borer of a well-known type.

An exhibit was sent from the Forestry Museum to the Royal Counties Agricultural Show last summer, and aroused much interest among visitors. The thanks of the Council are due to the Curator of the Museum, Mr. A. D. C. Le Sueur, for his work in selecting and preparing the exhibit.

Publicity.

The services of an adviser on matters of publicity were engaged during the year to act jointly for The Institution and the Institute of Chartered Accountants with a view, especially, to bringing the designation "chartered" more prominently before the public, and a Standing Publicity Committee has also been set up. It must, however, be borne in mind that full recognition of the designation "chartered surveyor," and all it implies, is a goal which each individual member must himself help in attaining. Its use, in a proper professional manner, on letter paper, brass plates, boards, &c., may be said to be increasing, and this will materially assist the end in view; but there are other media which must not be forgotten, for example, notices, articles and reports, whether for legal or financial purposes which bear the name of a member, and are likely to appear in the press, or be seen or read by sections of the public outside the profession.

The Standing and Special Committees.

There have been 12 meetings of the Council and 87 meetings of the Standing and Special Committees and their Sub-Committees during the period under review. In addition a number of sectional meetings of members practising in Quantities, and of holders of the Sanitary Science Diploma have been held.

The Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, the London Building Acts (Consolidation) Bill, 1928, the Local Government Bill, 1928, the Architects' Registration Bill, 1928, the Northern Ireland Administrative Provisions Bill, 1928, the Agricultural Credits Bill, 1928, and the Companies Bill, 1928, were examined and reported upon, appropriate action being taken in each case. The Parliamentary Committee have, in addition, made further progress in moving for an amendment of the existing law of easements, and have now reached main agreement on points of principle with the Law Society and the Royal Institute of British Architects. Other matters which have been claiming their attention during the year are the powers of the Central Electricity Board to acquire wayleaves for transmission lines under the Electricity Supply Acts, concerning which two articles have appeared in the Journal; and the effect in practice of Sections 35 and 46 of the Housing Act, 1925.

The Departmental Committee of Enquiry into the qualifications of Colliery Officials having asked for observations from The Institution on their subject of reference, certain recommendations, including one urging the recognition of The Institution examinations, were made for reviewing the conditions laid down for the grant of mine surveyors' certificates. Oral evidence in support thereof was given for The Institution by Mr. C. H. Gott, chairman of the Education Committee, and Mr. T. H. Bailey (Fellow).

At the request of the City Engineer of London a report was prepared by the Sanitary Science Diploma Section on the draft bye-laws, &c., proposed to be made for drainage and sanitary work in the City of London.

The Agricultural and Forestry Committees have met on several occasions, and have dealt, inter alia, with the following matters: The eligibility of parks and paddocks for rating relief under the recent statutes; the effect of these statutes on the assessment of woodlands for income tax; the agricultural tenant's security for tenant-right where land is mortgaged and has depreciated in value; the effect of the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, on a landlord's powers of distraint for rent; the preparation of a standard agreement for sale of timber and a memorandum on the marketing of timber; and the series of resolutions put down for discussion at the National Conference on Agriculture called by the Central Chamber and held in February.

The series of explosions in gas and water mains in London caused the Council to set up a special committee, under the chairmanship of Mr. E. J. Silcock, to report generally on the possibility of preventive and protective measures, without, however, attempting to allocate the causes of, or responsibility for, any particular explosion.

The general meetings of quantity surveyors, of which two were held during the session, have enabled the Quantity Surveyors' Committee to keep in touch with the needs and views of the branch of the profession which they represent. The extension of quantity surveying practice to engineering works, the education of the quantity surveyor, the vexed question of tendering for public work, professional politics, publicity, the quantity surveyors' legal rights and liabilities concerning the discovery of dimensions and abstracts, were among the subjects dealt with.

Representations were also made to a local authority which had invited tenders for considerable works without providing quantities, and these resulted, it is understood, in a resolution being passed which would prevent this omission in future. The Committee also dealt with numerous inquiries of a technical nature, and the Council would remind members practising in quantities that the Committee are prepared to give advice and assistance on professional problems so far as lies within their power to do so. By permission of the Council a quantity surveyors' dinner will be held towards the end of the year, an event which the Committee hope will be supported by members in that branch of the profession.

After a conference with representatives of the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute, the scale of professional charges was altered in certain respects, the most important change being an upward revision of the fees payable under Ryde's Scale to valuers preparing a case for hearing. A new edition of the "Schedule of Professional Charges," embodying these revisions, has been issued to members.

The County Branches.

Two changes have been made during the year in the County Branch organisation. South Derbyshire, which had formerly been attached to Warwickshire, Worcestershire, and Staffordshire, was transferred in accordance with local wishes to the Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire, and North Derbyshire Branch; and the Bedfordshire, Essex, Hertfordshire and Middlesex Branch was divided into two, the one covering the urban areas to the north and north-east of London, and the other the more rural portions of the old Branch. They will be known as the "Middlesex and Urban Essex Branch," and the "Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire, and Rural Essex Branch," with a membership, respectively, of 550 and 320, each being empowered to nominate a representative for election to the Council under Bye-law 44 (B).

There was a full attendance at the Annual Conference of the Council with the Chairmen and Honorary Secretaries of County Branches on 4th February, when various items of a domestic nature were discussed. Of these may be mentioned the proposal that Rural and Urban Committees should be set up in every Branch to report, through their executive committees, upon matters affecting the corresponding sections of the profession in each district. The Council feel that an extension of this system, already existing in some Branches, over the whole organisation would assist headquarters in keeping touch with local needs, and be of special service in connection with the provision of information on agricultural affairs.

The Diamond Jubilee Celebrations, which took place in London, were the occasion of the Annual Summer Meeting in 1928. The Institution will be the guests of the Irish Branch in June, 1929, in Belfast, and of the South Wales Branch in Cardiff in 1930. An invitation from the Northumberland and Durham Branch to hold the Meeting at Newcastle in 1931 has also been accepted.

It is perhaps unnecessary to refer in detail to the meetings and other activities in which the County Branches have been engaged, as reports of these have appeared each month in the Journal during the period under review. Their usefulness and diversity may, however, be gauged by the following list, by no means complete, of subjects discussed at provincial centres in the course of the year: The application and advantages of the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926; the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928; the recent measures for relief from rating; the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927; slum clearances; improvements in suburban development; the practice of agricultural valuations; modern aspects of the law of injurious affection; town planning; wayleaves for electricity transmission lines.

Further steps in the extension of the local organisation system abroad have been taken by the formation of a Branch in Hong-Kong, and the affiliation of the Chapter of South African Quantity Surveyors to The Institution.

A table showing the membership and officers of County Branches on 1st January, 1929, appears in the List of Members for the current year. In concluding this section of the Report, the Council desire to record their indebtedness to Chairmen, Honorary Secretaries, Executive Committees and readers of Papers for the valued service they have rendered The Institution during the year.

Junior Organisation.

The programme of Papers arranged for the evening meetings in London during the session was as follows: 19th November, "Some Details of Building Estate Management," by Mr. B. E. Lawrence, P.A.S.I.; 17th December, "The Traffic Problem," by Mr. E. C. Trotman, P.A.S.I.;

14th January, "Town Planning," by Mr. H. H. E. Timmis, P.A.S.I.; 11th February, "The Effect of the Landlord and "Tenant Act, 1927," by Mr. E. G. Smith, P.A.S.I.; 11th March, "The Tendency of present Reforms in Rating," by Mr. H. W. J. Powell (Fellow); 11th April, a Mock Hearing under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927; 22nd April, "The Effect of Unqualified Competition on the "Chartered Surveyor," by Mr. O. C. Kelly, P.A.S.I.

Of these Papers the first and second respectively were awarded the President's Prize and the Chartered Surveyors' (1913) Club Ryde Memorial Prize.

The Chartered Surveyors' (1913) Club have offered for next session a new prize to be awarded annually, and to be known as the "1913 Club Special Prize," to the Junior Member, not being a member of the Committee, who makes the most valuable contribution to the success of the sessional meetings, excluding the writing of a Paper.

The Annual Full Committee Meeting, at which representatives for the Gloucester, &c., Hampshire, &c., Lancashire and Cheshire, Warwick, &c., Yorkshire and Scottish Junior Branches were present, was held on 7th December, and was followed by the Annual Dinner in the Connaught Rooms. Eighty-nine were present at the latter, and the guests included the President and a number of other distinguished members of the profession. The Annual Dance, held at the Prince's Galleries in February, was again a pronounced success, and the profit from the sale of tickets amounted to £57. The sum so realised was handed to the Benevolent Fund.

Special steps were taken at the beginning of the session to stimulate interest in and increase the attendance at the Junior Meetings. The success of these efforts is apparent in the fact that the average attendance over the period under review was 86.6 as against 63 and 65 for the two previous years.

A new Junior Branch for Cambridge, Huntingdon, Norfolk and Suffolk has been formed during the year, and a successful inaugural meeting was held at Cambridge on 18th March. Two experimental meetings of Junior Members in the Rural Essex Sub-Area of the Bedfordshire, &c., Branch have also taken place.

Under the new regulations, which came into force this year, the fortieth of the Junior Organisation's existence, a Central Committee, more truly representative of Junior Members throughout the country, has been set up, and includes, in addition to unattached country members, representatives from all the Junior Branches now in being. The Council hope that the increased facilities now provided will lead every younger member to realise the advantages of the Junior Organisation in disseminating professional knowledge, in promoting the welfare of the profession, and as a training ground in discussion and debate as well as for higher office in The Institution.

The Employment Register.

Appointments were obtained through the Register by 81 applicants during the period under review. Of these, 8 were in the Land Agency Branch of the profession, 45 in the Valuation Branch, 15 were Building Surveyors, and 13 Quantity Surveyors.

The object of the Register is to meet the needs of Senior Members having vacancies to fill as well as of Juniors who are seeking employment or wish to improve their position. The Council therefore hope that members in the former category will make it a practice to acquaint the Secretary of their requirements as vacancies occur.

Miscellaneous.

Apart from the work carried out exclusively through the Council and Committees of The Institution, reference must also be made to matters investigated or dealt with in co-operation with other bodies. These include the National Conference summoned by the Central Chamber of Agriculture to discuss the economics of agricultural reconstruction, followed by deputations to the Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, and Mr. Lloyd-George; a Conference with the Central Landowners' Association and the Land Agents' Society, the purpose of which was to elucidate, for the benefit of members of those bodies, the effect of town and regional planning on agricultural property; a Council of Enquiry, formed under the chairmanship of Sir William Mackenzie, to review the economic position and technique of the building industry; a Joint Committee, whose interim report appeared in the Journal for August, 1928, on the effect of coal residues when used in contact with steel; conferences to discuss the co-ordination of town planning examinations with representatives of the various societies conducting tests in that subject; and the preparation of a form of specification for building works on the group principle, which is in course of consideration jointly with representatives of the Royal Institute of British Architects.

The British Engineering Standards Association has sought the advice of The Institution in connection with the issue of British standard specifications for the following, representatives being nominated to the drafting committees in some cases, while in others the draft specifications were forwarded for comment before publication: Road signs and signals; concrete pipes for drainage, water supply, and cables; gauges for portable railway trucks; concrete pipes for civil engineering; vitrified ware pipes (The Institution's representative, Mr. E. J. Silcock, being elected chairman of the Drafting Committee); slipper baths, manhole covers and frames for drainage; road tars; hard steel wire for concrete reinforcement; small clear specimens of timber; and building materials.

It must be recorded with satisfaction that during the year the Directors of the London Auction Mart, Limited, courteously permitted the admission of members to the Estate Exchange on the same terms as members of the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute.

Meetings of the Joint Committee on the "Standard Method of Measurement" have been held as occasion required. The alterations in the "Standard Method" authorised by the Committee during the year have appeared in the Journal.

Membership of The Institution has been recognised by the Honourable the Minister of Education to the Dominion of South Africa for the purpose of statutory registration of Quantity Surveyors in the Dominion.

The following record, necessarily incomplete, of the honours gained and public work undertaken by members of The Institution during the year may be of interest:—

The Royal Commission on the Powers and Duties of the Police in England and Wales included Sir Howard Frank, Bt., G.B.E., K.C.B. (Fellow), among its members.

The Royal Commission on London Squares, of which Sir Howard Frank and Sir Maurice Gwyer, K.C.B. (Associate), were members, issued their Report at the end of 1928. Evidence for The Institution had been given by Mr. C. Gerald Eve (Member of Council) earlier in that year.

The President (Mr. C. B. Fisher, C.B.E.) was nominated to represent The Institution at a conference of bodies interested in agriculture, which was called by the Electricity Commission in connection with the supply of electricity in rural areas.

Major Vivian Rogers, D.S.O., M.C. (Fellow), was elected Mayor of the City of Westminster in November, 1928.

Mr. C. A. Bernard (Fellow) was nominated by the President, pursuant to the Bristol Corporation Act, 1928, to serve on a Committee to advise the Corporation concerning the elevation of buildings; and Mr. Donald Dinwiddy (Fellow) to serve on a similar Committee set up under the Sevenoaks Town Planning Provisional Order.

Mr. W. Woodbridge Biggs (Fellow) and Mr. E. E. Finch (Fellow) have been appointed to represent the City Corporation of London at the Congress of the International Federation for Housing and Town Planning at Rome this year.

Mr. R. S. Woof (Fellow) was nominated by The Institution to serve as their representative on the Cumberland Joint Town Planning Committee.

Mr. A. G. Cross (Fellow) was nominated by The Institution as Quantity Surveying Assessor for the Daily Mail Ideal Home Competition.

Messrs. E. J. Silcock, F. Massie and H. Kaye (Fellows) were nominated to represent The Institution at the Royal Sanitary Institute Congress at Sheffield in July, 1929.

Among the public appointments for which members of The Institution have been selected during the period under review may be mentioned the following: Chief Technical Officer, Ministry of Transport, Lt.-Colonel C. H. Bressey, C.B.E. (Fellow); Chief Inspector of Works, War Office, Colonel J. A. L. Billingham (Fellow); Assessor to the Government of Ceylon, Mr. Allan Kirk (Colonial Fellow, Special Diploma in Rating); City Engineer of Rangoon, Mr. Irwin Walker (Colonial Fellow); Chief Land and Estate Agent, London Midland and Scottish Railway, Mr. W. H. Christy Clay, O.B.E. (Fellow); Housing and Town Planning Inspector, Ministry of Health, Mr. A. W. H. Brown (Fellow); Head of the Estate Management Branch and Lecturer in Estate Management, University of Cambridge, Mr. E. P. Weller (Professional Associate); Building Surveyor, Corporation of Salford, Mr. R. G. Morgan, M.C. (Professional Associate); District Valuer for Cornwall, Mr. W. R. Bingham (Fellow); Demonstrator in Estate Management, Cambridge University, Mr. Noel Dean (Fellow).

ADDENDUM.

Notes from the Reports of the Examiners, 1929.

The object of these notes is to assist those responsible for the instruction of candidates by indicating the respects in which the latter have shown special lack of preparation, and by pointing out aspects of their work to which inadequate attention has apparently been given. While, therefore, it is not the usual practice to refer to features which have called for praise from the examiners, it is satisfactory to note that, taken generally, the reports are more favourable this year than for some time past. In Agricultural Chemistry, Land Drainage, Farm Homesteads, Animal Physiology, Law of Vendors and Purchasers, Imperial Taxation, House Drainage and Plumbers' Work, Specifications and Economics, distinct improvement was shown as compared with recent years.

Although there were fewer instances of bad spelling and arithmetic, untidiness, poor handwriting, bad draughtsmanship and printing and weak grammar are still commented upon. In some of the legal papers many candidates failed to appreciate the true meaning of words and phrases. Generally, there was again the old tendency towards diffuseness where brevity would have sufficed, and the advantage of illustrating answers by clear and simple sketches was still insufficiently realised. Some candidates were so weak in English geography that they based their answer to a question in the geology paper on the supposition that Morecambe Bay was on the Welsh coast or Bristol Channel.

More important, perhaps, is the fact that many marks were lost through mere carelessness, due, in some cases, to failure in accurately reading and digesting the questions asked; in others, apparently, to unnecessarily hurried answers. Candidates should not allow themselves to be intimidated by questions the apparent length of which is due to the description of details, and which will, when carefully studied, be found to require comparatively brief answers. By cultivating calmness and accuracy in the examination-room, they will not only save both time and marks, but will also accustom themselves to meeting in after life the emergencies that are experienced in every busy office.

Sub-Division I.

Geology and Soils.—Geological outline of English and Scottish counties was poor in a number of papers, although a wide choice was given to candidates.

Agricultural Law.—The provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, had been insufficiently studied.

Agriculture.—The standard on the whole was poor. Several candidates recommended the dunging of bare fallows before ploughing and cleaning, and others said that a good sample of hay should be full of seed, that malting barley should be cut before it is ripe and the grain be hard and steely.

Agricultural Botany.—There were many bad answers to a question on the mixing of agricultural plants for summer cutting and feeding green to cattle.

Forestry, Timber Valuing and Measuring.—The question on the number and average contents of trees at end of a rotation was not well answered, though it bears on an important aspect of forestry.

Report.—Standard generally low; few candidates gave particulars of the tenancies of the two farms let, or included tests of the drainage and water supply of the mansion-house. The regeneration of woodlands and ideas for water supply had received too little attention.

Sub-Division II.

Valuations.—Most of those who answered the question asking if their valuation of a hereditament would differ according to its occupation by owner or tenant stated that their valuation would be lower in the latter case as the cost of repairs would be greater. Few knew the correct method of finding the gross and rateable values of a cottage let at 14s. per week, the landlord doing all repairs and paying rates. The apparent lack of reasoning power amongst the majority of candidates was remarked upon by the examiner.

The standard reached in the non-typical papers was also disappointing, the work of 50 per cent. of the candidates being very poor. Many failed to grasp the principle on which valuations are made, and a large number forgot that repairs must be taken into consideration in valuing house and cottage property. Carelessness was also shown in the position of the decimal point, so that fantastic results were achieved.

Report.—While candidates, with few exceptions, showed sufficient technical knowledge of the subjects on which they were asked to report, their presentation of that knowledge left a good deal to be desired. Grammar and syntax were poor; journalistic jargon and the inordinate use of technical terms abounded. Most candidates forgot the virtue of straightforward language in reporting to a client with only a lay knowledge of landed property.

Sub-Division III.

Constructive and Working Drawings.—Intermediate candidates in the higher paper were weak in joinery details and draughtsmanship. Final candidates, with few exceptions, did not know the proper method of calculating steel-work, and had but little idea of design or the use of materials. An oak staircase, which, in practice, would require fine and tasteful treatment, was designed by the majority with crude details suitable only for deal.

Quantities.—The standard, as a whole, of the higher papers showed some improvement on recent years, but candidates were still unable to take off quantities with confidence. Some even forgot that accuracy is essential in bills of quantities, while the majority did not realise that the working out of superfluous dimensions is a grave source of error, and may be reduced to a minimum by the application of mensuration to the measurement of apparently complicated surfaces. Nor did they remember the necessity for basing descriptions on the specification notes given in the paper. In analysing prices, there was a need for clearer and more methodical tabulation, and candidates seemed unable to grapple with practical problems such as ascertaining the extra cost of special brick facings and the cost of simple steelwork items. In the lower papers candidates were unfamiliar with the "Standard Method of Measurement" and with the system of grouping measurements, with the result that dimensions were difficult to follow and often incorrect.

House Drainage and Plumbers' Work.—The standard generally was higher than formerly, but a good many candidates avoided a question on the treatment of waste from a range of urinals, and did not understand how to deal with a tier of bath wastes. A large proportion evidently had had no practical experience in the use of lead wool. There were many mistakes due to questions not being carefully read and understood.

Report.—Candidates for the most part did not sufficiently study the question set, and so wasted time in writing down irrelevant matter. Many reports were ill arranged and badly expressed.

Mechanics.—A very small proportion of candidates correctly answered questions on pressure on a wall of brickwork and the centre of gravity of an area.

Iron and Timber Roofs.—Most candidates had no knowledge of the scantlings required for ridge and the ceiling joists and did not provide a damp-course through the parapet wall. As regards steel roofs, few showed ties from the upright steel framing carrying the louvre ventilator back on to the rafters. Little knowledge was shown of lead-covered steel glazing bars, which in many cases were shown in wood framing.

General Subjects.

Town Planning and Building Estates.—Candidates were weak in their knowledge of the application of the Town Planning Act, 1925, and the Model Clauses, and of modern lay-out and the preservation of amenities. The method of presenting a report should receive more attention.

Surveying and Levelling.—Candidates were inclined to adopt empirical or rule-of-thumb methods in arriving at their answers. Adjustment of instruments requires more attention.

Law of Landlord and Tenant.—There appears to have been a tendency to study recent legislation to the exclusion of the principles on which this branch of law is based.

Law of Dilapidations.—There was a marked improvement on recent years, particularly in knowledge of practice and procedure, but many candidates knew nothing of the recent statutes and case law affecting this subject. A number appeared to reply on the Act of 1871 for their knowledge of ecclesiastical dilapidations.

Enfranchisement of Copyholds.—Although an important subject, the calculation of compensation payable to the lord of the manor was, on the whole, poorly done.

Law of Arbitration.—Some candidates mentioned the Lands Clauses Acts or the Acquisition of Land Act, 1919, as the statutes governing a reference to arbitration upon the rateability of machinery and plant. Many did not know that provisions for arbitration are made in statutes other than the Arbitration Act, 1889, and the Acquisition of Land Act, 1919.

AFFILIATED SOCIETY:

SOUTH AFRICAN INSTITUTE OF QUANTITY SURVEYORS (INCORPORATED),

26-27, Connaught Buildings, St. Andries Street, Pretoria, Transvaal.

The Surveyors' Institution

(INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER)

Is established—

1. To secure the advancement and facilitate the acquisition of that knowledge which constitutes the profession of a Surveyor, viz.—the art of determining the value of all descriptions of landed, mineral and house property, and of the various interests therein; the practice of managing and developing estates; and the science of admeasuring and delineating the physical features of the earth, and of measuring and estimating artificers' work.
2. To promote the general interests of the profession, and to maintain and extend its usefulness for the public advantage.

THE INSTITUTION was established in 1868 and is incorporated under a Royal Charter, granted in 1881, and a Supplemental Charter, granted in 1921.

MEMBERSHIP.

The total membership of the Institution is over 7,000, and consists of four classes, viz.: HONORARY MEMBERS, FELLOWS, PROFESSIONAL ASSOCIATES, and ASSOCIATES. There are also classes of PROBATIONERS and STUDENTS attached to, but not corporate members of, the Institution.

STUDENTS.—In order to qualify for admission to the Class of Students, candidates must be between the ages of 18 and 21, must have passed either the Preliminary Examination of the Institution or one of the specified Examinations accepted in lieu thereof, and must be either (1) pupils or technical assistants in the offices of members of the Institution or other persons substantially engaged in one or other of the branches of the profession as defined above; or (2) studying with a view to entering the profession at such places of professional instruction as the Council may approve.

Candidates under the age of 21 are advised to become Students; for, in addition to the use of the Library and Loan Library, receipt of the Journal and the right to attend meetings, they are entitled to substantial advantages in the Professional Examinations in respect of fees and percentage of pass marks.

Students remain attached to their class until the end of the calendar year in which they attain the age of 21, and may then be enrolled in the class of Probationers.

PROBATIONERS are persons whose period of Studentship has expired or who have passed the Intermediate Examination. They may continue as Probationers until the end of the calendar year during which they shall have been for five years enrolled in that class, or until the end of the third calendar year after that in which they passed the Intermediate Examination, whichever period first terminates.

All candidates for the Intermediate Examination are required to give an undertaking that, if successful in passing, they will forthwith become Probationers and so remain for the full term allowed by the By-Laws.

Probationers are entitled to use the Library and Loan Library, to attend meetings and to receive the publications.

PROFESSIONAL ASSOCIATES.—Candidates desirous of election to the class of Professional Associates must be not less than 21 years of age, and must have passed the Preliminary Examination (or an examination accepted in lieu thereof) and the Intermediate and Final Examinations. Candidates holding a University degree in subjects approved by the Council as appertaining to the surveying profession may take a single examination in place of the Intermediate and Final. After passing the examinations, candidates are eligible for election to the class of Professional Associates, provided that they are no longer in statu pupillari and are actually engaged in professional work as Surveyors.

FELLOWS.—Candidates must be not less than 30 years of age, must have passed either (1) the Preliminary or an exempting examination and the Intermediate and Final Examinations, or (2) the Direct Fellowship Examination; and must have held for five years, and be holding, a position of complete responsibility equivalent to that of a principal in an established business.

There are special arrangements for the election of Colonial Fellows.

ASSOCIATES must be persons over 21 years of age, not Surveyors by profession, whose pursuits are such as to qualify them to co-operate with Surveyors in the advancement of professional knowledge.

HONORARY MEMBERS must be persons who, either by reason of their position or experience, or their eminence in science, may be enabled to render assistance in promoting the objects of the Institution ; but are not engaged in practice as Surveyors in Great Britain or Ireland. They have the privilege of being present and taking part in all Ordinary General Meetings, and of access to the Library, but no right of voting, discussing or otherwise interfering in the affairs of the Institution ; nor are they called upon to contribute to its funds.

ELECTION TO MEMBERSHIP, other than Honorary Membership, is by ballot of all the corporate members of the Institution. All Fellows, Professional Associates and Associates are required, within twelve months of their election, to attend an Ordinary General Meeting, or, in the case of members residing at a distance from London, a meeting of their County Branch, for the purpose of formal introduction, and to sign the Register. They are also required, within the same period, to deliver to the Council an original paper on a subject connected with the profession, or to make a donation to the Library Fund.

RATES OF SUBSCRIPTION.

The following are the rates of contribution to the funds :—

EXAMINATIONS.

THE PRELIMINARY AND SPECIAL EXAMINATIONS.—Any candidate intending to follow the profession of Surveyor will be accepted on application, but acceptance for the Preliminary Examination does not imply that a candidate, if successful in passing, will necessarily be regarded as eligible for enrolment as a Student, or for admission to the Intermediate and Final Examinations. There are no age limits, but candidates over the age of 25 are permitted to sit for a special Examination, instead of the Preliminary, to test their general knowledge and education. The entrance fee for the examination is £1 11s. 6d.

THE INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATION.—Candidates must be 19 years of age or over, and, unless studying at a recognised place of instruction, must be a pupil or technical assistant* in the office of a member of the Institution or other person substantially engaged in the profession of Surveyor as defined above. The entrance fee for the Examination is £4 4s. 0d.

THE FINAL EXAMINATION is open to candidates who have passed the Intermediate Examination; the entrance fee is £4 4s. 0d.

THE DIRECT FELLOWSHIP EXAMINATION.—Candidates for this Examination must be more than 30 years of age, and their position must be such as would make them eligible for direct election as Fellows on passing the Examination. The entrance fee is £5 5s. 0d.

The Preliminary and Special Examinations are held annually in January, and the Intermediate, Final and Direct Fellowship Examinations in March. Applications to sit for any one of the Examinations must be on the prescribed forms and must be submitted, together with the examination fees, during the previous September.

The Intermediate, Final, and Direct Fellowship Examinations are divided into four Sub-Divisions, to cover the four main branches into which the profession may roughly be divided, viz.:—I., Chiefly Land Agency; II., Chiefly Valuation; III., Chiefly Building or Quantities; and IV., Chiefly Mining. Candidates may elect to be examined in any one of these sub-divisions, but those proceeding to the Final Examination after passing the Intermediate must do so in the same sub-division.

THE SPECIAL SINGLE EXAMINATION for holders of University degrees in a course of study approved by the Council as bearing upon the profession, is held concurrently with the other professional examinations, and combines the subjects required to be taken in both the Intermediate and Final. Entrance fee £4 4s.

Copies of the rules governing the examinations and giving full particulars thereof, may be obtained from the Secretary on application. The detailed Syllabus and List of Text-Books (which relates to the professional examinations only) can be obtained at a charge of 1s., and past examination papers at 2s. for each annual set.

* Articles, although much to be recommended as a method of training for the profession, are not an essential condition of admission to the Examinations.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERSHIP.

Fellows and Professional Associates are permitted to place the initials F.S.I. and P.A.S.I. respectively after their names, and to use the designation "Chartered Surveyor," subject to the provisions of the By-Laws.

Members, both corporate and non-corporate, have the right to attend the Ordinary General Meetings, meetings of their County Branch, and, if under 33 years of age, the Junior Meetings, and have the privilege of introducing visitors. They receive the Journal, which is issued in twelve monthly parts, and a copy of any other printed publication issued by the Institution. They may avail themselves of the Queries and Replies section of the Journal, and so secure the benefit of the knowledge and experience of fellow members in questions arising in daily practice. They may use the Library and Loan Library and the Employment Register.

The Incorporated Benevolent Fund of the Institution is established to provide for the needs of members and their dependents who, by reason of age, sickness or other unavoidable misfortune, are unable to support themselves. It is maintained entirely by voluntary contributions.

ORGANIZATION AND WORK.

The affairs of the Institution are under the management of a Council, elected annually by ballot of all corporate members. The Council are advised by the County Branches and a number of Standing and Special Committees appointed to consider the various matters referred to them. Their work includes the examination of Parliamentary Bills affecting the valuation, management, and development of landed property, and the various interests therein; the preparation of memoranda, and the submission of evidence for the use of Government Departments, Royal Commissions and departmental and other Committees in connection with matters upon which the collective knowledge of the profession would prove of assistance; and the rendering of advice to Imperial or Local Authorities when called upon to do so by statute or otherwise.

In addition to their activities in the advancement of the public interest, the Council have continually in view the elevation, ethical as well as intellectual, of the profession which they represent. In addition to the practical help which they have afforded to places of professional instruction, the foundation of scholarships and the furtherance of technical education generally, they have felt it their duty strictly to administer the rules of conduct which all members are required by the By-Laws to observe. The Council have also, through their Professional Practice Committee, used their influence in inspiring a high ideal of professional honour among members.

The Session of the Institution commences annually on the Second Monday in November, and continues to the end of May. The Ordinary General Meetings are held monthly during the Session, and in addition two Meetings of members practising in Quantities are arranged. At these Meetings original papers on professional subjects are read and their merits fully and freely discussed. Every member has the privilege of introducing visitors.

THE COUNTY BRANCHES.

The organization of the Institution includes a system of Metropolitan and County Branches, the object of which is to enable the Council to give the considered views of the profession from all parts of the country on matters of public interest; to afford opportunity for members generally to take an active part in the affairs of the Institution; and to assist the Council in ascertaining their local wants and wishes. The system includes machinery for local representation on, and succession to, the Council and Standing Committees and provides, in addition, opportunities for the discussion of professional questions and social intercourse at centres easily accessible to members in country districts. The affairs of each Metropolitan and County Branch are managed by an Executive Committee elected annually.

THE JUNIOR MEETINGS.

The Junior Meetings are established for the benefit of the younger members of the Institution, to bring them into closer touch with the Council, and, by fostering among them an interest in professional affairs, to prepare them for higher office in the future. The work of the Junior Meetings is administered by a representative Central Executive Committee which is responsible to the Council for their affairs as a whole. Junior organizations in the County Branches have been established where justified by numbers and the existence of accessible local centres.

SCHOLARSHIPS AND PRIZES.

Four Scholarships are offered annually by the Institution, two of which are of £80 per annum and two of £50, each being tenable for three years at any recognised University in an Honours course approved by the Council as bearing upon one or other of the branches of the Surveyors' profession. They may be held only by Students of the Institution or by those undertaking to become Students. Under the conditions of tenure an Institution Scholar must agree, at the completion of his course at the University, to enter the office of a Surveyor with a view to his practising as such in the future, and to pass the professional examinations of the Institution. Particulars may be obtained on application to the Secretary.

A number of valuable prizes are offered in connection with the Institution Examinations.

THE LIBRARY AND COLLECTIONS.

The Institution Library contains approximately 12,000 volumes, and includes a topographical section comprising the great County Histories, all the principal local histories, and a London collection; a series of works on British Agriculture, both ancient and modern, and the allied subjects of Forestry, Geology, Botany, Agricultural Chemistry and Vegetable Physiology; a complete series of professional text-books, including the latest works; works of general science; the Public General Statutes from the earliest times; Law Reports and Law Text-books; Parliamentary Papers and Reports; the Transactions of kindred societies and general works of reference. It also contains a number of valuable single works and rare editions of special interest to the book-lover, as well as a collection of old maps, charts and plans.

The Loan Library is independent of the General Reference Library, and contains some 1,600 volumes, including all the principal professional text-books, which may be borrowed by members according to the prescribed rules.

The Forestry Collection contains a series of home-grown timber exhibits in planks and sections; preserved specimens of the foliage, flowers and fruit of the more common British trees and of timber insects, injurious and otherwise; and a collection of saws, tools and other implements used in forestry. Various causes of damage to timber and the commercial uses to which British woods may be put, are also illustrated.

The Geological Museum includes specimens of the fossils found in British geological formations and a collection of stones used in building.
